Title: Letter from Benjamin Rush to Julia Stockton Rush
Date: August 26, 1787
Location: I-ButterfieldL-1971-1
My dear Julia,

Phila. 26 August 1787

I feel myself insensibly led by by the law of association, to devote this evening, as I did the two last Sunday evenings to writing to you, & if your mind continues to vibrate with mine, I am sure you will feel an expectation & a desire tomorrow
of a letter from me exactly at the same hour you received one from me on the two last Sundays you have spent at Moore's.

I dined this day with Mr. Bryan and went with Mr. O'Bryan & Mrs. Blackwell to St.
Peter's Church in the afternoon. I drank tea with Mrs. Blackwell who is indisposed, and finished the day by attending divine service at St. Paul's Church. Mrs. Blackwell read to me several pieces of her poetry which were truly elegant — and far above mediocrity. I think her not inferior to your describer in practical taste as well as invention. She beseeches me to present her love to you.

I yesterday received a bill of $50-0-0 as an apprentice fee with a young gentleman from North Carolina. I will keep to write off a good deal of debt. "The Lord hath made provision for the whole way" said good Dr. Price on his death bed. We have hitherto found it so.

This is only instance of divine good for which it becomes us to commemorate. In dividing the lands I held in company with Mr.
Mr. Clay, I drew one tract of 500 acres, which he told me the next day would itself be a handsome fortune for a child. Every foot of it is the richest meadow ground & is now covered with natural grape. Besides this I drew a tract of 1000 acres on the river Kingsborough which Mr. Clay says must soon or later be the seat of a County town. I drew a third tract of 500 acres of which he yet, I do not know the character.

Sam Caldwell has at last called his creditors together. Poor Mr. Caldwell may perhaps live unsuccessful to repent of her attempts to deprive one of family of bread. Bringing reverse of fortune only helps. How truly wise it is to leave the avenging of our injuries to him who claims it as one of his prerogatives!

When shall I and Andrew with the horses?
Altho' my books have supplied in some degree the pleasure of your company, yet they begin to lose their relish without you. I daily hear of many things which punish in my bosom from not being communicated.

"Shut up - want air,"

and spoil like bales, exposed to the sun.

My volume of medical essays go to the pargeter tomorrow. They contain more new opinions in medicine, than ever I have published in morals or metaphysics. I have dedicated them to Dr. Cullen.

My love to the children, and to every member of your maiden's family. The girl, who once waited for my death to forget me, will slyly I have a cell in my brain full of new arguments in favor of our beloved system of religion, but she shall not have them till I receive an answer to all my former letters from her.

Adieu - Think me often, and be aware of the steady affection of yours

My dear Julia,

Philadelphia, 26 August 1787

I feel myself insensibly led by the law of association to devote this evening, as I did the two last Sunday evenings, to writing to you, and if your mind continues to vibrate with mine I am sure you will feel an expectation and a desire of a letter from me tomorrow exactly at the same hour you received one from me on the two Mondays you have spent at Morven.

I dined this day with Mr. O'Bryan and went with Mrs. O'Bryan and Mr. Blackwell to St. Peter's Church in the afternoon. I drank tea with Mrs. Blackwell, who is indisposed, and finished the day by attending divine service at St. Paul's Church. Mrs. Blackwell read to me several pieces of her poetry, which were truly elegant and far above mediocrity. I think her not inferior to your Mama in poetical taste as well as invention. She begged me to present her love to you.

I yesterday received a bill of £50-0-0 sterling as part of an apprentice fee with a young gentleman from North Carolina. It will help to wipe off a good deal of debt. "The lord hath made provision for the whole way," said good Dr. Finley on his deathbed. We have hitherto found it so. Nor is this the only instance of divine goodness which it becomes us to commemorate. In dividing the lands I hold in company with Mr. McClay and others, I drew one tract of 500 acres which he told me the next day would of itself be an handsome fortune for a child. Every foot of it (he says) is the richest meadow ground and is now covered with natural grass. Besides this I drew a tract of 1000 acres on the river Susquehannah which Mr. McClay says must sooner or later be the seat of a county town. I drew a third tract of 500 acres of which as yet I do not know the character.

Saml. Caldwell has at last called his creditors together. Poor Mrs. Caldwell may perhaps live to repent of her unsuccessful attempts to deprive me and my family of bread. Dr. Ewing's reverse of fortune only sleeps. How truly wise is it to leave the avenging of our injuries to him who claims it as one of his prerogatives!

When shall I send Andrew with the horses? Although my books have supplied in some degree the pleasure of your company, yet they begin to lose their relish without you. I daily hear and see many things which perish in my bosom from not being communicated.

"Thoughts shut up, want air,
And spoil like bales unopened to the sun."

My volume of medical essays go to the press tomorrow. They contain more new opinions in medicine than ever I have published in morals or metaphysics. I have dedicated them to Dr. Cullen.

My love to the children and to every member of your Mama's family. The girls have not waited for my death to forget me. Tell Polly I have a cell in my brain full of new arguments in favor of our beloved system of religion, but she shall not have them till I receive answers to all my former letters to her.

Adieu. Think of me often, and be assured of the steady affection of yours [ .... ]
