Two Alumni Receive Honorary Degrees: Three Inducted Into Sports Hall of Fame

Dickinson's Commencement Weekend is always a time of fun for all—students and other members of the College community, parents and alumni alike. But another individual entered into this year's festivities, which were held Friday, May 19 through Sunday, May 21. He's that well-known and often maligned fellow called "the weatherman".

That villain (no offense meant to any of our meteorologist friends) dampened the campus for Saturday's Alumni Day festivities, forcing most activities to be moved indoors. But, as anyone present knows, he was unable to dampen the spirits of those present.

Sunday morning's weather looked as if he might do his dirty deed again. But along about noon, the skies cleared and Dickinson's traditional Commencement exercises were held where they should be held—on the John Dickinson Campus in front of Old West.

Two alumni were among those receiving honorary degrees at Commencement. They are Carl C. Chambers '29 and Meyer P. Potamkin '32.

Chambers, who received a Doctor of Science degree, is Vice-President for Engineering Affairs at the University of Pennsylvania and an international authority on radio interference. In 1966, he was named the Delaware Valley Engineer of the Year. A former dean of the Moore School of Electrical Engineering at the University of Pennsylvania, he is now responsible for the operations of all four of that university's engineering schools.

Carl, who is Vice-President of Dickinson's Board of Trustees, is a member of the Governor's Science Advisory Committee and is on the Board of the Pennsylvania Science and Engineering Foundation. Several generations of his family have attended Dickinson.

Meyer P. Potamkin, who received a Doctor of Fine Arts degree, is a Philadelphia art collector, patron of the arts and civic leader. He is a member of the Board of Trustees of the Philadelphia Museum of Art and has donated an extensive collection of paintings, sculptures and other art works to Dickinson.

Potamkin is also Director of Philadelphia's Settlement Music School, Chairman of the Board of Trustees of that city's Camp for Indigent Children, a member of the Board of Managers of Glenn Mills Industrial School for Boys, Co-founder of the Sara Allen Nursing Home for Blacks and the Pennsylvania Representative of National Boy's Clubs of America. He is President of the Boulevard Mortgage Company.

Others receiving honorary degrees were: Commencement Speaker, United States Senator Jacob K. Javits, Doctor of Laws; Dr. Charles H. Long, historian at the University of Chicago whose special field is West African religion, Doctor of Humane Letters; Dr. B.F. Skinner, Edgar Pierce Professor of Psychology at Harvard and noted authority on the experimental analysis of behavior, Doctor of Science.

Hall of Fame

Two players on the Dickinson football team that upset Penn State in 1931 and the late Andrew Kerr '00, renowned as one of America's finest college football coaches, were enshrined in Dickinson's Sports Hall of Fame on Alumni Day.

In addition to Kerr, whose two sons were on hand to receive the award, those honored were Edward E. Johnson '32 and John Milton Davidson '33.

In presenting the individual awards, President Rubendall read the following:

"To the late Andrew Kerr, 1896 to 1900, baseball outfielder and Phi Beta Kappa student who became one of America's outstanding college football coaches. His lifetime record of 137 wins, 71 losses and 14 ties includes a 1931 Colgate team that was undefeated, untied and unscored upon. Andy was disappointed that year because his team was not invited to the Rose Bowl. Today, we invite him and his life to remain a permanent part of our memories through our Hall of Fame."

"To Edward E. Johnson, 1927 to 1932, football halfback best known for his runs in the 10-6 Dickinson victory over Penn State. Catcher and leading hitter on the baseball team. And a basketball player as well. He became an outstanding high school coach and was responsible for sending Dickinson many fine scholar-athletes. Today, he is principal of Edison Junior High School, West Orange, New Jersey."

"To John Milton Davidson, 1929 to 1933, football lineman, basketball forward and captain and sparkplug of the 1933 Dickinson track team. He set a long-standing school record in the high hurdles and ran on the successful mile relay team at the Penn Relays and Central Intercollegiate Championship. He is an executive with Pennwalt Corporation, Philadelphia, possesses a sterling background of service to Boy Scouting, the Presbyterian Church and to the Board of Trustees of Dickinson College."

"Pappy" Honored

As a suitable wrap-up to this year's Alumni Day Luncheon, a special presentation was made by General Alumni Association President H. Chace Davis '50 to Paul "Pappy" Ellsworth Hodge, whose name has been synonymous with Phi Epsilon Pi fraternity at Dickinson for more than half a century.

The handsome engraved plaque which was presented to Hodge (pictured below) reads as follows: "In recognition of more than 50 years of dedicated service to the College community, the General Alumni Association of Dickinson College bestows this award of commendation on Paul 'Pappy' Ellsworth Hodge."

"Pappy" was the honored guest at a reception for alumni at the Phi Epsilon Pi fraternity house later that afternoon.

The Mermaid Players: Prodigals of Ingenuity

by Rick Smolan '72

"We were prodigals of ingenuity," marvelled Mr. B., recalling with rough pride the piecemeal construction of a drama department by an extraordinary band of actors—the Mermaid Players. Amazing success over the past twenty years converges on one man—Mr. B. himself—and 92 driven students—the Players.

When I turned into his office in the student union, the back wall of which windows Mathers Theatre, Professor David Brubaker was fixed at the ledge of his desk and intent upon the students who had gathered that afternoon. It was clear that Mr. B. (which is what all of his associates, faculty and student alike, call him) was comfortable with his audience. I thought he might want to conduct the interview in private, but when I sat down and switched on the tape recorder, no one left. Mr. B. went right on talking. For about 90 minutes, David Brubaker talked about the history of Dickinson's Drama Department, his students, his teaching, and himself. Here, in some greater order, is what we said.

Making a Career

Maybe we should start out this interview with a sort of general question. Why did you decide to teach acting instead of becoming a professional actor yourself?

"Why did I become a teacher? Well, my mother was a teacher, and my father was a teacher for a while. I suppose that had something to do with it. I think that everyone who becomes a teacher really does it because he met a great one once who really impressed him. I've known several. When I was in college I thought I was going to end up teaching English, but as soon as I graduated I had the opportunity to act—so I grabbed it!

"I worked as an actor for three years. It was pretty far off Broadway, but I've always been proud of those three years because it was pretty hard to do—making a career of acting."

Where did you act during those three years?

"The Cleveland Playhouse, one year at the Harrisburg

A man of many masks and many seasons, David R. Brubaker, now in his 16th year at Dickinson, teaches, directs, acts and educates. He received the Lindback Award for Distinguished Teaching in 1968. The Mermaid Players production staff boasts of 92 actors coordinated by Mrs. Marjorie Brubaker.

Community Theatre, and one year up in Erie. During the summer I worked at Summerstock. Then I got called back into the naval reserve for a two-year stint during the Korean War. By the time I got back to the states I felt I had been sidetracked. Professional theatre seems to be so much a matter of contacts. After two years out of the country I just felt I'd have to start all over again. After all the agony of being out of school five years, I decided to find something a bit more permanent. Another reason for a permanent job was because we had adopted our son in Japan.

"The opportunity to work here at Dickinson was only supposed to be for one year, but I was appointed for another year and another and another, right up to the present."

The Curriculum

Developing and "understanding and appreciation of the theatre arts through creative exercise and study of theory, practice and history" is the stated purpose of the Dramatic Arts Department. Its sole professor elaborated: What was the program really like the first few years he was here?

What year did you come to Dickinson and what was the theatre program like in those first few years?

"I first came to Dickinson in 1956. The College had begun the Mermaid Players four years earlier. When I was hired the idea was, and still is, to have the drama teacher devote half of his time to the teaching of an actual course, and the other half of his time to directing a theatre group called the Mermaid Players.

"When I began, it seemed to me that the place for me to throw most weight was into the extracurricular Mermaid Players program, because I can reach many more students there than I can reach in a classroom. There just isn't room in classes for the kind of participation we have in the extracurricular program. I think the theatre group deserves more weight, also, because of its effect on the community. The theatre is where we can reach them, when they are members of an audience.

"So I decided that the energy of a single drama professor should go into the non-credit part of my work. A few years ago I had a half-time sabbatical leave. On sabbatical, you are supposed to teach half-time, but you receive normal pay. So I chose the half that I thought was the more important; I dropped the course part and put my time into the Mermaid Players productions. The joke is that I had chosen the wrong half as far as what the school had expected me to choose. But the administration has always been very sympathetic, as have the other faculty members. They all seem to feel very strongly about this department.

"Maybe I can explain why I put the emphasis on the non-academic part of the course, even today. Again, it has to do with my own background. I never had an acting course in my life. I never had a course in directing. These skills came out of working in the professional theatre. So, what I am trying to say is that maybe the combination of a student's regular courses plus what he gets from the Drama Department will give him a good liberal arts background.

"If there is a person who can gain from a liberal arts education, then this is the place for him. They were interviewing Bert Lahr once and they asked him what did he think about the training of a young actor? He replied that there was nothing so valuable as the young man getting up in front of an audience. What did Lahr think about drama schools? He said they were fine to the extent that they give a youngster a chance to get up in front of an audience, but as far as the actual courses they offered, he didn't think they were worth very much. Well, they said to him, what would you have an actor study in college? Lahr replied, 'Oh, I don't know, let him take some courses in French.' French? Why should you want an actor to major in French? And Lahr said, 'Because of the words! Words are an actor's tool,' and Lahr was responding to the idea that the more you know about a word, the more it will help you to act when you are saying that word. It occurred to Lahr that this (French) was as good a study as any for a young actor. He used to do crossword puzzles."

When was the drama major finally established at Dickinson and what problems did you encounter? Why did it take so long?

"The problem I encountered in creating a drama major at Dickinson College is that, in order to make a respectable dramatic arts major, we need a minimum of three instructors. The perspective of one man, no matter how good he thinks he is, is not enough for a drama major.

"When I first got started here it didn't seem to me then that there was any possibility that Dickinson College would ever be able to make such a big jump—from one-half a man teaching a course in drama to three men on a full-time basis. Let me explain why I think you need three full-time professors. A top-flight drama department should be capable of offering, not one course in acting, like today, but three or four. Begin with a course in the technique of the speaking voice—not public speaking, but rather how the sounds are made, the proper way to breathe, getting your body, the instrument, into the correct shape. Directing should be a two or three semester sequence of courses. The same thing with the history of the theatre. There should also be courses in makeup, lighting, drafting, design, construction, costumes. All these things are necessary if you want to have a good drama department.

"You should understand that our drama major as it presently stands still isn't a drama major in the terms that a Carnegie Tech or a Penn State or Temple is offering a drama major. Ours is an interdepartmental setup, with studies in theatre and dramatic literature. We combine our theatre courses with dramatic literature courses offered by the language and English departments. We can offer a major only by combining a number of courses in different departments. Out of a minimum requirement of ten courses, only four are offered by the Drama Department. Those four are Introductory Acting, History of the Theatre, Directing, Stagecraft and Scene Design.

"There is one thing more required of our drama majors. We ask them all to participate in the extracurricular program, the Mermaid Players. This serves in lieu of a seminar."

The Players

The Mermaid Players were established in 1952. When Brubaker arrived at the College in 1956, the Players performed in the Belles Lettres Room on the third floor of Denny Hall. It seated an audience of 150. "We did beautiful work," says Brubaker, "we really did." The numbers in the audience gradually grew to over five hundred: "And that's why Mathers was built."

With elaborate and technical theatre facilities, the Players are equipped to engineer scenery and plays on a professional scale. There are a lot of people who always volunteer to do those behind-the-scenes jobs, too: ushering, set design, lighting, costumes, make-up, production work. What makes these people contribute their time and energy when it seems like the actors are the ones who receive the applause after a performance?

"I think it's the very same impulse that makes someone want to act. People aren't acting for an ego trip; they act because they realize that this is a way of saying something to an audience. The actor can communicate an idea, not with the written word, or with paint, but with his body and his interpretation of a role. People feel good when they can do that. It's just the way we are made. Now the guy that's working on the lighting feels the same impulse to say something that an actor does. Really. They may be on the lighting board because they are a little shy about their acting and don't want to try out. They say to themselves, 'I really don't have the voice or presence that's needed for that.' But they still see the medium in the same way that the actor does.

"Actors who are playing roles are also lighting scenes for other actors. They work on building the sets when they aren't rehearsing. The same people do every part of a production. Some of them are here all the time. Some are only here a little bit of the time. In terms of their attitude for the theatre there is no difference whether they are on stage or backstage, it's the very same thing that makes somebody come backstage and work."

In the past ten years there has been an amazing change in the hobbies, interests, fashions, thoughts, hair length and general outlook on life on the part of many young people. Has this apparent change affected your operation of the theatre? Have you noticed a difference in the students that have come out for acting recently as compared to when you began in 1956?

"There's an obvious change in the number of people who want to get their hands into the theatre. But that has happened in any artistic field; it's happened in fine arts and in music, too. Kids are getting excited about all the areas of art; they are beginning to understand that it does have something to do with living, it's not just a fringe to the real education going on. I mean that 10 years ago, music or art or drama was 'something I'll do when I get my real work done.' Or it was something you did on a Sunday afternoon. Art wasn't something that should concern a man living in the real world; it was something for a Wednesday afternoon's ladies club to discuss. I find now in college students that they place a much higher value on art. They have a much greater concern for the arts.

"Another difference, apart from the growing number of students, is that at one time it seemed that only women were interested in it. Only girls would come out for the theatre. Several years ago there was a football player who did a bit of acting with the Mermaid Players. People were amazed! But now it doesn't seem strange at all for an athlete to be interested in the arts as well.

"Look. How do you deal with life? How do you understand the world that you are in? There are so many things that you have to learn. The things you need to live are not just dealing with essays, or writing them.

"There's also the business of realizing the way an artist does, coming to deal with things and understand them and work with them as with a paintbrush. Learn line form and color. You have to look at things from an artistic viewpoint. Everybody has a trace of a histrionic sensibility in them, and that's what we try to make use of in the theatre. That's an ability that should be developed too."

I was wondering whether any of the others here want to say something about your experience in the Drama Department and Professor Brubaker.

Vince Patterson. "The most exciting thing here is that I feel capable, as a graduating senior, of going out and being part of a theatre where I could design my own sets, build my own sets, design my own lighting, run my own lighting, direct a play and act in it, even make my own costumes. (Vince has already produced a college play, Woizeck, this spring.) There you have the whole thing. I know from people I know at big drama schools that there is a real conflict when you try to move yourself into other areas of specialization. There's a real resentment if you should know how to do more than one thing well. That's about the last thing you'd find here.

"One thing that Mr. B. would never say is that he is solely responsible for the desire instilled in the students to participate in the drama activities. That's what is so amazing: you get all these people who come to Dickinson from all different kinds of backgrounds and you find that the people who come back to see the shows after they've graduated aren't necessarily the people who were active in the theatre. Somehow, he's affected them in a really strong sense."

Finally, A Department

Before we end, Professor Brubaker, is there anything else you'd like to comment on?

"Yes. There is one thing that I think I should explain. I think that when people hear that the Drama Department has 28 majors, despite the fact that it's less than a year old, they tend to judge it by numbers instead of thinking about the issues involved in having a drama major at a liberal arts college. It's kind of like the guy who sees a beautiful building: 'How much did it cost?' Oh, about six million dollars went into that building. 'Oh, really. Gee I saw a six million dollar building today.' Nobody evaluates its architecture, or experiences it as architecture, or spends time puzzling about that. They just let it go at its price tag.

"It's possible to do that even in a college. How big a department do you have? How many majors will you have next year? And so on; you get the number game. Every college in this country has a drama program. Every college does so many plays. But no matter how big that department, no matter how many professors, or majors, they claim to have, I don't think that there are any that have the quality that we do. I really don't."

Alumni Survey

The questions below and on the following pages are submitted in the form of a survey to all Dickinson Alumni by the Alumni Council on behalf of the General Alumni Association.

The survey is designed to determine alumni attitudes on a variety of subjects concerning Dickinson College and, in some cases, on other issues. Its purpose is for information only and, as you will note, you are not requested to sign the survey. Similar surveys are to be submitted to Dickinson students and faculty. Results will be published at some point in the future.

Once you have completed the questions, please cut the appropriate pages from this magazine and mail to: Alumni Survey, Alumni Office, Dickinson College, Carlisle, Pennsylvania 17013.

"Beauty is everlasting and dust is for a time"

MARIANNE CRAIG MOORE

November 15, 1887 - February 5, 1972

by Martha Slotten

This phrase from Marianne Moore's poetry adorns the blue cover of the memorial service booklet prepared by the Lafayette Avenue Presbyterian Church of which she was a devoted member for nearly forty years. This is one of the most recent additions to the Library's Marianne Moore Collection, and a gift from her minister, the Reverend George Litch Knight after her death.

A recent library exhibit of the poet's letters, manuscripts, and memorabilia chronicled Miss Moore's early relationship to Carlisle as well as her ties with Dickinson where she received an honorary doctorate in 1952. In a March 19, 1952 letter to Professor John Steckbeck, Miss Moore details her biography. She, her mother and brother moved to Carlisle about 1896 where her mother taught English at Metzger Institute for 14 years. Among our archives of Metzger Institute is a large folio record book showing Miss Moore's grades for the years 1899 through 1904, all indicative of the talents which would make her one of the country's most laureled poets. She was graduated from Bryn Mawr in 1910, came back to attend the Carlisle Commercial College in the next year, and then to teach at the Carlisle Indian School from 1911-1915. She writes to John Steckbeck, "I recall James Thorpe, Iva Miller (his first wife), Joel Wheelock, Gus Welch, were pupils in my (commercial) department... I found them incomparable in cooperativeness, courtesy, earnestness as students—also friends and invaluable in aiding me to preserve discipline in my part of the building—a rather serious matter at times."

President Edel's correspondence with Miss Moore shows that Professor Eric W. Barnes on May 17, 1951, suggested Miss Moore's name to the Committee on Honorary Degrees. "One of our leading poets", he wrote, "perhaps, since the death of Edna Millay, the most important American woman poet. In addition to several volumes of verse and criticism, Miss Moore has done much to increase our sense of contemporary poetic values..." Dr. Edel's friendship with her brother John Warner Moore, underscored the warmth she felt about her visit to the campus on May 1, 1952 for a special convocation in which seven other women were awarded honorary degrees in connection with the opening of Drayer Hall.

Appropriately, a student who was then on campus, Dr. Ronald Goldberg, Class of 1954, and a member now of the Friends of the Library Committee, has made the purchase and addition of several Marianne Moore manuscripts and first editions to our collection his generous concern. A sports enthusiast, who played lacrosse under Professor Frank Warlow, our Marianne Moore scholar on campus, Dr. Goldberg now finds great satisfaction in memorializing the petite poet who adored baseball and counted such sportsmen as Casey Stengel, Cassius Clay, and John Hay Whitney among her friends. Among recent Goldberg gifts to our library is a collection of six letters written from 1925-27 to a fellow poet while she was Acting Editor and Editor of The Dial.

The slight woman with the spidery handwriting must have been a generously reciprocal correspondent as well as an inveterate lecturer and public personality. A hurried manuscript note written in 1965 in answer to a writer's request notes, "Am moving unexpectedly, am desperate—have to be at 3 colleges. No time to prepare. No rest."

T. S. Eliot remarked "that her poems form part of the small body of durable poetry written in our time." Marianne Craig Moore was the winner of the Pulitzer Prize, the Bolingen Award, the National Book Award, countless other prizes, awards and honorary degrees. The bulk of her literary papers are with the Rosenbach Foundation in Philadelphia. Our small but distinctive collection, enriched by our newly formed Friends of the Library, is a tribute to one of our most distinguished alumnae.

The collection in the Morris Room includes one of her earliest poems in typescript signed by her:

O, David, if I had
Your power, I should be glad -
In harping, with the sling,
In patient reasoning!

Blake, Homer, Job, and you,
Have made old wine-skins new.
Your energies have wrought
Stout continents of thought.

But David, if the heart
Be brass, what boots the art
Of exorcising wrong,
Of harping to a song?

The scepter and the ring
And every royal thing
Will fail. Grief's lustiness
Must cure the harp's distress.

Keatley is Honored

"There's no other way I would have wanted it," asserts G. Harold Keatley '27 after clearing the 45-year mark in the foreign service. It seems that his colleagues agree with him: in February, Keatley received the traditional pin for his 45 years of government service. But that's not all, for last year he was also awarded the Department's "bronze medal" for his "outstanding service in supporting overseas commercial representation" in the Foreign Service.

When he retired this spring, Keatley had completed 26 of his service years as a liaison officer. Earlier, he acquired a breadth of liaison experience as the private secretary of the then Secretary of State Henry L. Stimson, working with him in the Philippines from 1929 to 1933. Keatley began his formal association with the Foreign Service in the State's Division of Commercial Affairs. He held a position in the Division of Communications and Records until 1946, when he moved into the liaison post which he has held for more than a quarter of a century.

A Ph.B. graduate of the class of 1927, Keatley is also a past vice president of the General Alumni Association. With his wife, Rosa Dora, Keatley is planning on traveling extensively, hopefully to China, during his retirement.
