Carolyn Bryant talks about one of her careers and then adds, "I am now editing and writing articles on wind instruments for Grove's Dictionary of Music and Musicians, soon to appear in its 6th edition, and have continued programming for NALC. Occasionally I feel as though I lead two lives. Computers, however, are being used more and more in the field of humanities research, and someday soon I hope to combine research and programming skills in a single job."

THE COVER

"The flowers that bloom in the spring, tra la . . ." goes the old song but on a college campus more than flowers bloom. There are festivals—with folk dancing—and sports events, and exams, and classes under the trees, and a certain kind of zaniness that students love and that makes faculty members and administrators quiver.

THE WEATHERVANE

There is something disconcerting about preparing the May issue of this magazine when it is snowing outside. Thoughts should be of tulips and daffodils and green leaves but it is snowing outside. Just last week spring put in an appearance and organized types began to remove snow tires and oil lawn mowers but today, as I said before, it is snowing outside.

March, of course, is that kind of month, likely to be temperamental and deceitful, buds about to burst one day and snow on the ground the next.

Today's snow is the messy sort. When white, fluffy flakes come down in the prescribed way, Dickinson's gray stones look venerable, dignified. When the mix is more slush than snow, the gray turns cold and gloomy.

Students, of course, are on spring vacation and probably as many as possible have headed for Florida's beaches. There is a certain "wish I was there" feeling on the part of the editor which no doubt contributes to the cold and ugliness of this particular storm watch.

However, spring will come as it always has and by May Dickinson and Carlisle will be rejoicing in sun and blossoms and leaves. Reliable sources indicate that the Cumberland Valley rather outdoes itself in the matter of greenness. Of course, anyone receiving THE ALUMNUS is well aware of what the vernal equinox means here.

In the meantime this editor is rather forcibly reminded of a bit of poetry learned in childhood:

The March winds will blow
And we shall have snow
And what will the robin do then, poor thing?

Today that early bird had best find a barn and try to keep warm and dry—and join the rest of us in longing for the publication date rather than the deadline date for this magazine.

Questioning And Creating

The Smithsonian Institution and Dickinson's May Morris Room have more in common than first glance would suggest. There is a difference in size and scope but both share Spencer Fullerton Baird, class of 1840, and Carolyn Bryant, class of 1966, and both encourage the undergraduate student as well as the mature, experienced scholar.

Spencer Baird, of course, was the very young faculty member (1845-50) and nationally known naturalist (he helped Audubon with his bird identifications, for example) who got Dickinson's "Museum" underway (at one time it was larger and more used than the library). In 1850 Baird, a passionate collector whose teaching innovation was field trips, left Dickinson to help Joseph Henry set up the Smithsonian. He later became the Institution's Secretary.

Carolyn Bryant is a recent alumna whose article appears on page 6. The May Morris Room, located in Dickinson's Boyd Lee Spahr Library, is discussed by a current student.

Both articles are part of the ALUMNUS' continuing focus on the liberal arts as liberating and on the doing many things well member of society who is "questioning, creative, productive" to quote Bill Jeffries (See Feb. ALUMNUS, page 7).

ANOTHER KIND OF LABORATORY

by Robin Wagner '76

The idea of a laboratory at Dickinson College suggests the goggled, white-aproned experimenters of Dana and Tome working at microscope-lined lab desks, or conjures memories of three hours of torture on a sunny autumn afternoon in the pits of Althouse examining topographic maps. But laboratory experience is not confined to the realm of science alone. On the second floor of the library is the Morris Room, another brand of laboratory—and a well equipped one at that. (The Morris Room honors May Morris, college librarian from 1927-1956.)

Beyond the typical show items—the Priestley barrel organ, the busts of famous Dickinsonians, and the Buchanan and Nisbet memorabilia which line the walls and display cases—one can find a wealth of most sophisticated equipment designed for the professional historian as well as the undergraduate researcher.

This equipment consists of the college's archives, rare books, and manuscript collections open to all for investigation. While the term archives might suggest scenes of spectacled historians pouring over yellowing, dust-covered volumes piled ceiling to floor in some stuffy and dimly-lit cubbyhole, there is a far different atmosphere in the

The May Morris Room is located on the second floor of Boyd Lee Spahr Library.

Morris Room. A visitor is as likely to encounter a freshman history class being introduced to the use of primary sources for scholarship as to find distinguished patrons using the manuscripts for their own research endeavors.

The idea of using primary source material in the teaching of undergraduates at Dickinson has a tradition dating back to the mid-1950's when various members of the library staff and history department recognized the need for students to become acquainted with historical research methods in their truest form. They felt that the archives should be used as a laboratory for the examination of original documents as the best possible means of reconstructing a picture of the past. As a result, a series of research projects was formulated to acquaint students with material available in the archives. Over the years, the emphasis has shifted from exclusive use in upper-class history courses to the primary workshop of the Introduction to History classes.

Most basic of the teaching projects involves student editing of an original manuscript. Transcription of the seemingly illegible scrawl is often the first task. The student is then called upon to research the writer as well as figures and situations mentioned in the text. This leads, eventually, to an understanding of the letter in its historical context—the problems and events of the time that caused the individual to express himself the way he did.

A variation on this theme is achieved by giving each person in a history class a different letter written by the same individual. Through research and discussion, the students are able to work together to examine the author's beliefs and behavior within the span of his letter writing.

The archives offer a broad choice of letters for assignment. There are the collections of famous signatures—Dickinson, Nisbet, Rush, Buchanan, Priestley, and others—and many more unfamiliar names like Andrew Greg Curtin, Eli Slifler, Richard Henry Pratt, Annie Besant, Isaac Wayne, and Elizabeth Fry.

A 1791 letter, for example, from Joseph Priestley to Thomas Wedgwood discussing his uncertain future, would send the novice researcher to examine Priestley's connection with Wedgwood, the circumstances surrounding the Birmingham riots which destroyed his home and equipment, and his thoughts on immigration to some "freer" atmosphere.

In the international arena are letters from Catherine the Great of Russia and S.D. Pawarendrramesr, Second King of Siam. The Pawarendrramesr letter, written in beautiful script in 1862, congratulates American Commodore A. H. Foote on his success as head of the federal gunboat fleet in the Mississippi. Research unearths Foote's prior landing in Bangkok harbor. The king's references to our Declaration of Independence and other rhetoric indicate to the twentieth century reader an amusing attempt to appear polished and to demonstrate a familiarity with things Western.

Another successful archival project has been the teaching of history through biography. Students are assigned a lesser-known Dickinson figure, both from student bodies and faculties of the past, and are asked to reconstruct his life, particularly his Dickinson years, by examining such records as Faculty Minutes, The Dickinsonian, addresses, grade books and report cards, course catalogues, photographs, and club and fraternity rosters and histories. As a result of this project, the best biographies have been collected for eventual publication in an ongoing volume to be entitled a Dictionary of Dickinson Biography.

Morris Room patrons are not limited to professional researchers and would-be historians alone. Chemistry classes join other interested visitors who seek out the Morris Room to examine the collection of scientific apparatus owned by distinguished investigator, philosopher, and discoverer of oxygen, Joseph Priestley.

In active use in college laboratories until 1874, the Priestley assemblage of flasks, test tubes, and other glassware, as well as his famous burning glass and telescopes, now occupy a prominent position of display in the room. In addition, the rare book collection contains most of his writings.

For those fanciers of the truly archaic, the special collections holds a cuneiform reproduction of a Sumerian tablet. For the medievalists, a thirteenth century illuminated manuscript adorns the archives shelves.

For those intrigued with Dickinson trivia, the special collections is a veritable storehouse. The picture file contains hundreds of photographs on everything imaginable, including 1910 action shots of the Carlisle Indian School vs Dickinson football game and scenes from a student "frolic" at Sterretts Gap in the fall of 1892.

The Morris Room hosts John Dickinson's handsome silverware set, the tuning fork owned by Francis Scott Key, a Civil War army blanket belonging to a Dickinson student, and a worn pigskin—the reminder of the 1903 winning season. Also on display is an early telephone made and presented to the college by its inventor, Daniel Drawbaugh. Drawbaugh, who invented the instrument in 1874, two years before Bell, failed to receive the patent which went to Bell in 1881.

Besides serving as a museum and workshop for the novice investigator, the Morris Room affords the more interested student with an opportunity for detailed study in primary source material, utilizing some aspect of the collection in depth.

Senior Sarah O'Neill, who devised her own major in Women's Studies, is presently editing several personal diaries of nineteenth century American women which are in the permanent collection. Sophomore history major Ron Hershner, who is formulating plans for his upcoming honors research on Pennsylvania's Scotch-Irish immigrants, will rely heavily upon the archival material found in the Morris Room.

Curator Martha Slotten notes a connection between successful research projects in the introductory history classes and expanded interest in doing further primary source independent research. "Such studies," she said, "have increased in direct relation to earlier research experiences students have had in the Morris Room and they keep coming back for more."

The Morris Room is also the home of the Friends of the Library. Because of Friends' donations, the college has been able to continually supplement its existing collection through the purchase of more documents and manuscripts. To date, there are 290 collections of letters in the archives which amount to more than one-half million pages of old manuscript material.

In addition to these manuscripts, the library owns an extensive number of rare books. Among these volumes there is a fine collection of old Bibles, numerous nineteenth century travel books, and a large section devoted to works on Carlisle and Cumberland County in addition to other local histories. An item of current interest is the recently discovered 1825 translation of Frenchman M. Morand's Memoirs on Acupuncturation, tracing in detail the evolution of this practice as well as "how to" instructions for the particularly daring.

A bibliography of rare books on the occult, heresy, and demonology was recently put together for use in connection with Professor Clarke Garrett's course on witchcraft. The original Dickinson College Library, a collection of 1750 volumes belonging to Isaac Norris II and donated by college founder John Dickinson, is still maintained and can be seen lining the perimeter of the Morris Room. This collection recently has been catalogued and the catalogue was published this spring. (See February ALUMNUS, page 11.)

The growth of the Morris Room as a laboratory has been steady. Dickinson's first curator arrived in 1933 and there followed a continuous flow of thoughtful people who cared and collected—names like May Morris, Whitfield J. Bell, and perhaps most importantly, alumnus and trustee, Boyd Lee Spahr to whom the collection owes many of its most important manuscripts. Mrs. Slotten says, "He kept constant watch on the autograph market during the nearly three decades preceding his death in 1970 and consequently brought about the major expansion in letters that linked the history of the college to the nation and the state."

The biggest boost came, however, in our own decade as a result of the college's bicentennial in 1973 and through the efforts of former librarian and curator Dr. Charles Coleman Sellers, author of The History of Dickinson College. This special bicentennial writing encouraged the collection of research material and memorabilia which shall be as invaluable to future historians as it was to Sellers in his writings. Information on each building, trustee, faculty member, and committee that Dickinson ever produced was scavenged from dusty filing cabinets and building basements and turned over to the collectors in the Morris Room.

In recent years, Archivist Martha Slotten has formulated a method for the systematic accumulation of all institutional records. Minutes from committees, memoranda on policy, and any correspondence deemed of import are arranged and catalogued under her supervision. Although this thoroughgoing practice of saving is relatively new, it is surprising to note that the conservation of Dickinson records was carried on informally throughout its two centuries by conscientious faculty members. The archives owe a great debt to such figures as Professor Charles Francis Himes who felt the need to save correspondence and documents throughout the nineteenth century. His own personal collection was donated to the college upon his death in 1918.

It is because of Himes, and others like him with such admirable foresight, that Dickinson possesses items like the original deed of the college, trustee minutes dating from 1783, chronicles of eighteenth century Dickinson student debates, early minute books of the Belles Lettres Society, and a collection of autographs and letters of United States presidents.

The Morris Room remains then as one of the most concealed but well-equipped laboratories on campus. Its liberal policy of making primary source material available to undergraduates has made it a valuable workshop to the novice historian. According to Mrs. Slotten, "Many archivists and curators blanch at the thought of turning undergraduates loose with original manuscript materials. However proud we are that our collection has been useful to experienced historians, it has seemed natural to us that a collection such as ours should be made as relevant as possible to the students who are closest to it."

Musical Research for SITES

by Carolyn Bryant '66

"The Smithsonian's Traveling Exhibition Service plans to have an exhibit on American band music for the Bicentennial. Would you like to do the research for it?" With these words curator of American Music, Cynthia A. Hoover, of the Smithsonian's Division of Musical Instruments (National Museum of History and Technology), helped launch me on a 10-month long project that resulted in my collecting hundreds of illustrations of bands, band musicians, and band instruments, and involved me in learning not only about the many aspects of band music in America but also about the myriad problems that must be dealt with in putting together an exhibition for the general public.

Being asked to prepare the exhibit was a fortunate break for me. I had recently received an M.A. in musicology from New York University after 2½ years in New York City and had returned to Washington, D.C., to see what was available for a still rather inexperienced musicologist. Not being interested in teaching (just as well, since there were so few jobs to be had) I decided to inquire into museum work. There were no openings in the Division of Musical Instruments at the Smithsonian, but after several visits with Mrs. Hoover I settled on coming in as a volunteer to help set up a picture file on American music.

I was doubly fortunate in having another skill that enabled me to support myself while I was learning about museum research. At Dickinson I had majored in both music and mathematics, and had worked as a mathematician, then as a computer programmer, before starting graduate studies. Back in Washington, I took a part-time programming job with the National Association of Letter Carriers, a company that has proved remarkably understanding about my dual interests in computer science and musicology. When the chance to do the exhibit turned up—nearly a year later—I was able to arrange a part-time schedule for the exhibit contract, dividing my week about equally between the Smithsonian and NALC.

The Smithsonian Institution Traveling Exhibition Service (SITES) sends out shows to other museums, schools and colleges, civic centers and the like. Designed expressly for traveling, the exhibits differ from those that reside at the Smithsonian itself. Instead of being based on a collection of objects, the traveling exhibits are pictorial: each consists of a number of panels with illustrations and text—a “core package” complete in itself, but meant to be augmented by the institutions renting it.

Some exhibitions are prepared by Smithsonian employees; other, like mine, by independent researchers working under contract. As researcher my task was first to decide, along with the SITES administrators, on the scope and emphasis of the exhibit, then to select illustrations and write text and captions for both the exhibit panels and an accompanying catalog. Since the exhibit was planned for the Bicentennial Year, we decided that I should make it a broad survey covering the whole 200-year period from 1776 to 1976. In addition to showing the history of the many types of bands that have flourished in America, I also wanted to say something about band instruments themselves—how they work, how they are made and sold, and how they have changed through the years. Volumes, of course, could be written about all this, but in an exhibit the pictures (or objects) must really tell the story: people can hardly be expected to stand and read paragraph after paragraph of explanation! The catalog, on the other hand, was planned to have considerably more text, but fewer pictures. Will all this in mind I set about my collecting.

Quite expectedly, the Library of Congress provided a wealth of material. In the Music Division I searched through sheet music dating from the 1830s on for illustrated covers depicting bands. Though individual drawings, of course, could not be relied upon for accuracy, studying groups of them gave me a good idea of the size and instrumentation of typical bands of this early period. Instrumental “tutors” such as Dodworth’s Brass Band School (New York, 1853) provided not only data on individual band instruments and suggestions for band instrumentation and selection of music, but information about typical band activities. Advertising catalogs from musical instrument manufacturers were another source. Particularly interesting were some of those from the 1890s, in which meticulously drawn engravings of instruments, uniforms, and accessories combined with eulogies for this company’s “wonder” cornet or that company’s special band that gave a fascinating glimpse of the optimism and enthusiasm of the late 19th-century band movement. From the Division of Prints and Photographs came a photographic record of bands from the 1860s to the present, especially rich in pictures of Civil War bands (from the Brady-Handy Collection) and of school and town bands of the 1930s and 1940s (from a collection of photos taken for the U.S. Department of Agriculture, Farm Security Administration).

To properly research jazz bands I felt I needed to visit the city where it all started, so I spent a week in New Orleans at the William R. Hogan Archive of Jazz, Tulane University, searching through hundreds of photos, posters, and other memorabilia of the Jazz Age. A second trip covered libraries in the New York City and Boston area, including the American Antiquarian Society in Worcester, Mass., where among other things I studied a set of band books used by the Mass. 25th Volunteer Regiment during the Civil War.

Further illustrations came from other libraries, museums, and private collectors from all over the country. Indeed, one of the most pleasant aspects of the project was the new acquaintances I made in corresponding about items I was trying to track down.

While collecting illustrations I was also working on the exhibit text. A detailed preliminary outline, then drafts of sections of the text along with sample illustrations were studied by SITES exhibition coordinators Bill Kloss and Andrea Stevens. With less knowledge of bands but considerably greater experience in planning exhibits they helped me organize my material and provided advice on which illustrations would "work" well in the exhibit. The final exhibit text, okayed by SITES, was edited by the Smithsonian's Office of Exhibits Central, through which all written exhibit material passes. Out of nearly 500 collected illustrations I chose about 200 to be sent with the text to the exhibit designer.

Though most traveling exhibits are prepared completely within the Smithsonian Institution, this show, along with several others commissioned for the Bicentennial Year, was designed by Martin Stephen Moskof and produced by Modernage Graphics, both NYC firms. After the designer had blocked out a preliminary plan, I went to NYC to consult with him and approve the final selection of illustrations (somewhat fewer than the number I had sent). He then took the prints I had provided (8 x 10 black and white glossies and 2 1/4 x 2 1/4 color slides), and had them enlarged to the proper size, to be pasted up—along with text and captions set in type—into 1/2-size "mock-ups" of each of the 34 panels. Each mock-up was then photographed, enlarged to 30" by 40" and mounted.

While the designer started preparing the panels, I completed the text for the catalog. That, accompanied by about 50 pictures, was turned over to an editor and a designer of the Smithsonian Institution Press. The format we decided upon (which echoed several previous publications from the Smithsonian's Division of Musical Instruments) was a 7" by 7 1/2" soft-cover booklet of about 50 pages, with a color cover and black and white illustrations inside.

Finally, since after all the show was about music, I collected a variety of band recordings—everything from Yankee Doodle as it would have been played in the late 1700s to modern compositions for symphonic band—to make up a cassette tape to accompany the exhibit.

Production work was finally completed and the catalog printed in November of 1975. The show opened out in California; it will be exhibited in various locations through 1977.

A LOOK AT CONTINUING EDUCATION

For some years Dickinson College has been serving a handful of non-traditional students but has not had a continuing education program as such. Now the college senses a growing demand for this kind of educational experience.

Non-traditional students are those not in the traditional college-age bracket of 18-22. Increasing numbers of people in this category are looking for challenging ways to spend leisure time, Dean Kenneth L. Laws says, adding that state and federal government agencies are urging colleges and universities to provide programs for a broader spectrum of students. The projected decrease in the size of the pool of traditional college-age students is an important factor to be considered, also.

Dean Laws says that another non-traditional student is the one planning to complete deferred educational objectives or needing additional education because of changes in vocational aims. He indicates that this group also is increasing and believes that the college's first emphasis should be on people who have been away from education for a time and who wish to return and work toward a degree. It will be necessary to survey the needs of this group, contact the potential students, and develop a sensitivity to the unique problems of people returning to education, he points out.

At the same time the college is working with non-traditional degree candidates, Dean Laws contemplates identifying those courses and programs of interest to various groups of people who are not looking towards a degree. Professionals such as doctors and lawyers, businessmen, teachers, War College personnel, senior citizens, alumni, government employees—all can be expected to have particular needs that can be met within the college's regular curriculum.

Faculty members say that when older people are in their classes the quality of work from the class as a whole goes up. Traditional students are influenced by associating with mature people who are strongly motivated to learn. Dean Laws calls it "the rubbing shoulders effect" and adds that college alumni can make a real contribution to students by becoming part of this kind of program.

The step beyond these two approaches would be responding to needs for continuing education involving new programs distinct from credit courses. This could include special interest institutes, off-beat courses, cooperative ventures with other institutions, some quasi-vocationally oriented programs such as computer programming, and alumni summer seminars. Here again Dean Laws sees a chance for alumni to make a contribution by coming up with ideas. A major stumbling block at present is what to charge for this kind of program.

As a beginning experiment along some of these lines, Dean Laws, who is summer school director, has attempted to identify a few summer school courses of potential interest to non-traditional students. With the cooperation of the faculty members involved, these courses will be offered at a time and cost that should make them more accessible to residents of the local community or particular groups in the area. Eleven courses have been selected for the experiment. In most cases they are to be offered as a lecture or discussion series in evening hours, open to people who do not wish to invest the full effort of a credit course, plus additional time during the day for those who are taking the course for full college credit.

The courses to be offered this summer in the continuing education program are: Folklore (American Studies), Regional America (Economics), The National Economy (Economics), Money and Banking (Economics), Oriental Art (Fine Arts), Modern Middle East (History), World Models for the Future (Philosophy), The American Phenomenon (Philosophy), Violence and Aggression (Psychology), The Bible and the Church (Religion), and Introduction to Social Work (Sociology/Anthropology).

Professor Frederick Ferré is teaching the philosophy course, World Models for the Future. His approach is an example of how the continuing education and regular students can come together in the same course.

Professor Ferré plans to introduce both the traditional and non-traditional students to philosophy in an unusual way. He wants to get to philosophical essentials through the use of media such as movies or science fiction. These, he says are rich with relationships to his subject.

Some evenings students will look at movies together. Other evenings will deal with the implications of what they have seen and read. In this way the philosophy professor plans "to lower barriers to people who haven't been reading madly recently and to put regular and continuing students on an even footing."

This will be the third time that Professor Ferré has used this approach in teaching philosophy but he hasn't tried it with continuing education students or at the introductory level. He has taught beginning philosophy to American adults in West Germany, teachers at American dependents schools and says he likes to teach adults the foundations of philosophy because they have lived more and can absorb the implications. They have had troubles with their children, have faced life and death, have had problems with religion, the professor says—"philosophy means more to adults." Professor Ferré adds that he is very much looking forward to this summer's experiment.

Sports

BASKETBALL — WOMEN, MEN

The women's basketball team closed the 1975-76 season with a 14-2 overall record, the best since 1968 when women at Dickinson began playing basketball on the intercollegiate level.

The Devilettes became undefeated champions of the young Penn-Mar Conference with a victory over Elizabethtown in the final regular season game. Their record in the conference was 8-0.

The team was seeded first in a post-season Middle Atlantic Conference tournament at Elizabethtown and finished third. Upset by Franklin and Marshall, the women came back to defeat Gettysburg and Scranton to win the consolidation bracket.

The men's basketball team finished this season with a disappointing 7-16 record. Strong play down the stretch and the return of most of the squad point toward a promising campaign in 1976-77.

The Devils dropped several close early-season contests and never really got on the winning track. They finished a disappointing fifth in the conference with a 4-8 record. Winning three of their last four games eased some of the pain caused by a mid-season 12-game losing streak.

P. Richard Wagner

THREE TO KNOW

P. Richard Wagner '73 has been named head baseball coach at the college. He is currently a third-year student at the Dickinson School of Law.

At Dickinson, Wagner was a four-year letterman in baseball as a shortstop. As a senior, he hit .444 to lead the nation's NCAA Division II schools in batting average. At graduation Wagner received the MacAndrews Trophy, awarded to the year's outstanding athlete, and was presented with an NCAA Post Graduate Scholarship, granted on the basis of combined athletic and academic ability.

Dickinson's All-American swimmer, Clyde Vedder, is once again headed for NCAA Division III competition. Showing the form which gained him national recognition last year, the junior captured 28 first place finishes in ten regular season meets for the Red Devils.

One of the best all-around swimmers in the Middle Atlantic Conference, Vedder competed in several freestyle, butterfly, and backstroke events throughout the season, varying from meet to meet according to where the Devils needed him most.

In the final basketball game of the season, 6-4 junior forward Jim Johnston became the fifth player in the history of the sport at Dickinson to reach 1000 points. Johnston scored 14 points in the victory over Elizabethtown, running his three-season total to 1004.

The all-time Dickinson scoring record is held by '69 graduate Ted Jrusek who scored 1076 points in four seasons. This season Johnston scored 385 points in 23 games. His sophomore total of 405 points is his best to date.

WOMEN'S LACROSSE

Women's lacrosse at Dickinson started three years ago as a club sport. This spring it graduated to intercollegiate status with an eight game schedule, including four home games, and an outstanding coach.

The team is being coached by Mrs. Kathy Heinze whose coaching credentials are considered the best in U.S. women's lacrosse.

About ten years ago, Mrs. Heinze began coaching lacrosse at Wilson College. That was this area's first exposure to the sport played by women. Seven years ago she founded the Central Pennsylvania Lacrosse Association which gave women of all ages the chance to play lacrosse on the club level.

Kathy has twice been the director of the National Women's Lacrosse Association tournament, in 1973 and 1975. Both tournaments were hosted by Dickinson. Last September she coached the U.S. All-American team during an unprecedented undefeated tour of England. She also coached the U.S. team in 1973 and 1974.

Kathy is known and respected in the sport for her creative use of talent. To date she has coached six women from the Central Pennsylvania Association to All-American status.

Kathy Heinze grew up in England, daughter of an English father in the foreign service and an American mother. She excelled in lacrosse and, in fact, is one of the few women to be an outstanding lacrosse player both in England and the United States.

DICKINSONIANS IN THE NEWS

East African Development

George H. Honadle '66 served as project management consultant to a four-man evaluation team in Tanzania this winter. He spent three weeks analyzing the operation and impact of the Masai Livestock and Range Management Development Project. Funded by the U.S. Agency for International Development, the project is managed by the Tanzanian Ministry of Agriculture.

Honadle is a public administration Ph.D. candidate at Syracuse University and his dissertation research is on issues of project design in developing countries. He is co-recipient of a $25,000 research grant supporting the dissertation study. Honadle is a teaching associate with the Maxwell Training and Development Program directed by Robert W. Iversen. He holds graduate degrees in both African Studies and Public Administration. Also, he previously served as a Peace Corps volunteer in Malawi and taught in project management seminars conducted by Iversen's program in Ethiopia, Liberia, Tunisia, and Kenya.

Chamber Executive

David J. Newell '73 is the new director of the Bennington, Vermont, Chamber of Commerce. Though only 24 years old Newell's credentials impressed the Bennington selection committee. Since graduation from Dickinson, where he was president of the student body, Newell has been vice president of the members' service division of the Harrisburg Chamber.

Under his leadership the Chamber had a record membership drive. Newell also did extensive public relations work for the Chamber in Harrisburg. He is a candidate for a master's degree in government administration at the Wharton School.

Apple Man

John B. Peters '22 has been named "Apple Man of the Year" by the apple industry's leading professional publication, The Packer. The Dickinson trustee was honored at the annual meeting of the International Apple Institute in Phoenix, Arizona, for his contribution to the apple industry as "an outstanding grower, processor, and packer." He is the first Pennsylvanian to be so honored.

Mr. Peters has been a fruit grower since 1923 and president of the Mt. Orchard Cooperative, Inc. since its formation in 1932. He was one of the founders of the Adams County Farm Bureau Cooperative in 1926 and has been vice-president of Knouse Foods Cooperative, Inc. since its inception in 1949.

The Peters Orchards have expanded from 42 acres in 1923 to 2,000 acres operated today by a family corporation that includes four sons. About half of the acreage is planted in apple orchards producing about 500,000 bushels annually. The Dickinson trustee was named Man of the Year of National Apples Institute, now defunct, in 1950 and was elected Pennsylvania Master Farmer in 1951. He was president of National Apple Week in 1971 and for many years was chairman of the National Cherry Pie Baking contests in Chicago.

Mr. Peters was convinced early in his career that "farmers must work together to survive" which explains his interest in farmer cooperatives that include both buying and selling collectively.

Square Expert

William H. Benson, associate professor emeritus, is one of the world's experts on magic squares. Professor Benson, who taught at the college after retiring from the Navy, says he became interested in the ancient art of magic squares and has pursued it through the years "for the same reason the man climbed a mountain, because it's there." Recently Dover Books published a paperback titled New Recreations with Squares written by Professor Benson and his friend Oswald Jacoby, the bridge expert. According to the professor, magic squares date back thousands of years to China, where they were considered to be good luck. A magic square, according to the professor, is "a square array of the numbers 1 to N squared, formed so that the sum of every row, every column, and the two main diagonals is the same for each in an arrangement of the first 25 numbers such that the sum of every row, column, and main diagonal equals 65."

Glass Curator

The Chrysler Museum at Norfolk, Virginia, has appointed Paul E. Doros '74 as curator of glass. The Museum features one of the finest glass collections in the country, particularly in the area of Art Nouveau, Art Deco, French Cameo, and Sandwich. Mr. Doros' primary goal is to "make the public aware of the excellence of the collection by means of lectures, published articles, and catalogues." In this connection he has written, for his master's thesis, "The Tiffany Glass Collection of the Chrysler Museum at Norfolk," has completed a book on American cut glass, and is currently writing on Lalique glass. Mr. Doros will receive his master's degree in history at Old Dominion University.

The Planned Giving Office announces the Dickinson College POOLED INCOME FUND

There are two plans, each of which operates as its name implies: the gifts of various donors are co-mingled (pooled) in a consolidated fund for investment purposes. PLAN ONE has as its objective the production of income. PLAN TWO has as its objective growth in value of its portfolio.

Each donor or each donor's beneficiary is entitled to his or her pro rata share of the income earned by the fund. Then, when the interest terminates—at the death of a donor or beneficiary—this individual portion of the assets in the fund is distributed to the college.

You gain substantial tax benefits by investing cash or securities in Dickinson's Pooled Income Funds.
