BIOGRAPHICAL NOTE

Deb Fulham-Winston served as the director of development for South Central AIDS Assistance Network (SCAAN) from January 1992 until June 1995.

In the mid-1980s, concerned members of the Harrisburg LGBTQ+ community began organizing informal meeting. Troubled by the lack of services available for HIV-positive persons in their area, the group first helped meet the needs of their friends with the illness. As the disease entered mainstream consciousness, the group grew rapidly and began serving the larger community as SCAAN. In 1988, SCAAN used grant funding to hire its first three full-time staff members and served 13 clients; by 1995, the group was run by 12 staff members and assisted by 150 volunteers, aiding more than 255 patients.

Client services aimed to support patients through financial assistance with rent, groceries, utility bills, and healthcare premiums. SCAAN provided medical supplies such as bed pads, crutches, and wheelchairs, and organized a buddy system, connecting volunteers with patients. Buddies assisted with a variety of tasks, ranging from light housekeeping to the management of complex treatment regimens.

SCAAN staff served as advocates for their clients, helping them navigate welfare, social security, and other bureaucracies, as well as assisting terminal patients with end-of-life planning. SCAAN provided valuable educational resources, informing clients about their medical options with their annual Bulletin and organizing trainings at schools and churches to educate the general public. SCAAN later merged with the Lancaster AIDS Project to become the AIDS Community Alliance, and today is known as the Alder Health Group.
