Dr. Rubendall's position at the recent Declare Day was that the concerns of youth be met with respect, reason and hope. He accepted the conflict of generations as being real and he insisted that rather than pursue the futile enterprise of trying to eliminate it, we should recognize its potential for creativity.

DECLARE

\də'kla(a)|(ə)r\

To Declare Is to Make Known
—The Healthiest of Exercises in Human Relations

Scores of students and members of the faculty worked hard and wisely to plan, organize and direct a "first" in Dickinson History. DECLARE DAY came to be the name of this adventure. It was a day given over to a community consideration of the problems of the learning experience on our campus. Normal class routine was set aside and a moratorium was called on all other academic and non-academic College activities that might have prevented all members of the community from participating fully in the day's program. The day was to symbolize a new and high level approach to the changes necessary to improve the total educational experience—an experience marked by "inclusive participation" by all segments of the Dickinson community. The community did attend and indisputable evidence of a wide-spread awakening to our problems became apparent. An awakening that posed rationally the critical questions of our community and insisted on rational answers. The day was entered with a commitment to an unflagging response to concerns voiced with understanding and reason. It will have been well spent if we have succeeded in breaking down barriers to open communication, nurtured mutual trust, shared an emerging vision for renewal, and gained inclusive commitment to that vision. Now, statements on DECLARE DAY gathered from key figures in its fashioning.

By Dr. Howard L. Rubendall
President of the College

THE concerns of college students centering around the learning process, campus living patterns, college governance and including the universal problems of war, poverty and racism must be met with respect, reason and hope. If they are not so met our older generation will have lost its last best chance to move along rationally with the young and with some order and civility into a "new country." The incredible advances on all fronts of knowledge do augur a new land to be born free of the dramatically apparent social ills to which even the most insensitive of our generation can no longer be blind. The alternative is to see a new age being born in the costly and heartbreaking agony of vast social disorder and conflict.

I take this position as a college president because of a profound confidence in the mind of man to continue to find and master the means to resolve any social ill or crisis and with faith in an ultimate humane spirit in man. I join to these the firm conviction that youth, though rebelling, seeks some things that the older generation is yet capable of giving to our institutional forms and mode of living; a humanized, personalized sense of individual worth and the equally important sense of human mutuality. I believe that even today the younger generation wishes to be engaged with the older generation in going along the exciting road of future-building together.

BUT I foresee no resolution of the "generation gap." Attempted resolution by consensus would be sterile; by capitulation, irresponsible. Going along together with the generation gap makes possible a process that is an effective dialectical advance in the mood of humaneness and reason.

It was in the spirit of this position that the students and faculty gathered together its internal concerns and frustrations and entered into the Dickinson Declare Day described elsewhere in this issue. The day dramatized a process that must continue: students and teachers conjointly engaged in learning and living and, yes, in the governance necessary to make the process effective. The particular structures that will be worked out to further this engagement are of secondary importance to the spirit of the process, the sharing of respect and trust.

The Dickinson Community does not ignore the disruptive and irrational forces that appear in academia. Out of our experience these past few years, the Faculty of the College and the Student Senate have developed and are continuing to refine a judicial code and procedures that we hope provide us with the means to live and learn together with a sense of order, fairness and respect for the rights of others and keep to a minimum the excesses that violate the integrity of a community of reason. Believe me, we are serious about this code and the odds are great that it will achieve its ends provided it continues to have the viability of a community-based code. To keep it so is a challenge to the whole Dickinson Community.

During the planning days prior to Declare Day, the Sunday Service in the College Church was one developed by students. It was a dramatic and forceful presentation of the relevance for our day of the insights of the Cain and Abel story. The service was introduced by the following remarks by the student leader, remarks that attempt to undergird future-building with an awareness of urgency, a sense of history, and a spirit appropriate for the living together of men and women:

"The times, indeed, are a-changing! Change, however, is not new with our time and generation. It has been and will be in the future. Change—whether or not it will occur—is not the question. The folk song we have just sung points to a reality relevant to our concerns, but it really does not deal with anything of substance unless one goes beyond and beneath the implicit protest and threat. The issue of our time—here at Dickinson as we seek for solutions to our educational and communal problems and in society at large—is the quality and nature of change. What occurs after the change? Will basic humanity be better served in this way or in that? Will there be a better Dickinson and will we be not only different but more fulfilled human beings as a result of the change? The direction and the result of what is now occurring must be the question for the man who will be responsible as opposed to the man who is only interested in himself and in his 'own thing.' The question is one of the human self in relation to other human selves. . . .

" . . . In our worship today we are seeking directions, insight, possible clarifications to the particular and general human problems of our moment in history. We choose to do this by emphasizing the continuity of history—man with a past and future as well as a present. Our affirmation of the 'now' is deepened by our awareness of 'what was' and 'what can be.' With this in mind we have chosen the Cain and Abel story from our common heritage as a touchstone . . . It pointedly asks questions such as 'AM I MY BROTHER'S KEEPER?' and directs us to related questions of concern in the immediate crisis at Dickinson and in the larger transition and changed consciousness of our time. It does not offer solutions, but it does make us aware of the necessity for depth if we are to move beyond disruption to healing affirmation."

THE concerns of youth must be met with respect, reason and hope. The conflict of the generations is real. Rather than pursue the futile enterprise of trying to eliminate it, let us recognize its potential for creativity. Where the conflict gives rise to demonic excesses, let us continue to attempt to exorcise them through developing an honest and open mutuality of interest and concern, a mutuality that respects differences, yet allows them to work together for good. The one inescapable fact of any human situation is that we are in it together.

No Resolution Of the Generation Gap

By Michael Anthony Bloom
Moratorium Committee

EVER since the trauma of the English 380 debate (which, parenthetically, seems to have been mishandled by everyone except Prof. Sandler) discussion concerning the grading system has become a Dickinson cause célèbre. At the recent Declare Day moratorium on classes it came as no great surprise to see considerable debate about "our" new found cause. Most of the criticism of the present system was sincere and accurate. As one of those critics, I was asked to outline my ideas on the subject. So here goes.

Everybody talks about defining educational objectives, but almost nobody does anything about it. How often are educational units, whether large or small, prepared in response to the questions:

1. What is it that we must teach?
2. How will we know when we have taught it?
3. What materials and procedures will work best to teach what we wish to teach?

The grading process is involved with the second and third questions posed. But, its reason for being rests upon the first question—what is it that we must teach? and what are our educational objectives in the process of teaching? (and learning). Before one can seriously begin talking about a particular method of evaluation, one must be concerned directly with the question of educational objectives.

IN A college of the liberal arts, and specifically at Dickinson, our basic FALSE assumption is that there must, of necessity, be agreement on our educational objectives. Only in the greatest sense need such agreement exist. The methodologies we use to achieve these objectives can be as different and varied as the plethora of courses that are currently taught.

Can we adequately define what it means to be involved in a liberal arts education? Yes (for each individual) and probably No (for the institution). So I can speak only for myself when I speak of the liberal arts. By their very nature, students are amateur educationalists; professors are (or at least should be) professional educators—together their first concern is the pursuit of truth. Too often this pursuit is subjugated to the process of simply transmitting knowledge. Being exposed to enormous amounts of data is not enough. It is the purpose of the liberal arts education to teach professors and students alike how to use this data in ways that are meaningful to each one of them. Social and political and moral growth should develop simultaneously in the process of educational inter-action.

What does this mean for the present Dickinson student? When he entered College as a freshman he had no idea what it meant to be involved in a liberal arts education. He knew that he was enrolled in a small co-ed school with a good pre-law program and that Carlisle was relatively close to home. Four years later, he may still have no idea about his education, and what is worse, he may have no motivation to find out? Why? We have FAILED as an institution of higher learning to make his educational experience meaningful to him.

WE can make the necessary changes necessary to offer a dynamic, communicative education. One way to begin would be to make the following insurances:

1. For the Professor: he should have the right to encourage his particular brand of education in terms of the evaluational methodologies that are best suited to his ideas of education and to his own idiosyncracies. Even if a professor elects non-evaluation as an evaluative method, he should be allowed that freedom so long as he is encouraging education in the sense of the liberal arts. The only thing that need be demanded from him, in fairness to his students and his institution, is that he clearly state what method(s) he intends to use. To rule out educational experimentation for fear of failure is to preclude success!

2. For the Student: he should have the right to elect courses without fearing that they will be closed. He should be as much a formulator of teaching methodology as he is a receiver. Rather than arbitrarily being denied the right to teach because he is a student, this should qualify him as a "teacher"—another way of pursuing truth, of aiding in personal and intellectual growth.

In terms of grading, I would propose that during the freshman year, no letter-grades be submitted. In their place, written self-evaluations by students in conjunction with written faculty evaluations for the student be recorded for each course in which he has been enrolled. At the beginning of his sophomore year, the student would have the opportunity to elect from a multi-track evaluation system:

1. Traditional letter-grade (perhaps for those interested in professional and/or graduate school)
2. Honors/Pass/Fail
3. Pass/Fail
4. Credit/No Credit

His selection would be used in evaluating his field of specialty (major) which would be limited to a maximum of fifteen courses. He could well continue the evaluational format of freshman year throughout his career. All that really need be required is a four-year residency restriction (at Dickinson or credit-accepted institutions elsewhere).

THIS system would attract the kind of professor and student body that the previously outlined conception of a liberal arts education demands. If you were unsatisfied with what then existed you might well discover an institution that better fulfilled your educational needs. This evaluational pluralism is more applicable to Dickinson than would be the inception of an across-the-board single-track system. We are too much of a university-college, too diverse, and perhaps too fragmented to run on such a unilateral approach. This system may well be antiquated in ten years, but the key to education is flexibility and change!

So the problem is not really one of grading, but one of objectives.

By Horace E. Rogers, Ph.D.
Professor of Chemistry

Our Editor, Vince, thinks the senior member of the Faculty should give his impressions of Declare Day, March 5, here at the College. This was a first for old Dickinson. Classes were dismissed for one day to permit the students and faculty to "communicate." This is the key word on college campuses today. The program for the day is listed elsewhere in this issue.

Someone has said recently, "Everything we thought was nailed down is coming loose." You are also familiar with the cliché that there is nothing as constant as change.

My general impression of the day is that it was not a wasted day. On the other hand, I am not certain that very much was accomplished. I stayed with it all day from 9 a.m. until 10 p.m. Students were permitted to "let off steam" and presented matters for discussion that we have been reading in the Dickinsonian all year. No action was taken by the Student Senate or the Faculty.

The significant part of the day was in the afternoon when each department conducted a two and one half hour discussion with its majors. The Chemistry Department session was very helpful to us in our department. One of the humorous highlights took place when one of our very intelligent majors suggested that students be given the opportunity to teach. An immediate response to this by another major was, "Who wants to hear you teach? Professor X knows more about the subject than you do and can do a much better job of it?" Instantaneous applause and laughter followed. Typical points that were raised were evaluation of courses, text-books and professors. The science students who take a three hour lecture course with an additional four hours of laboratory each week receive the same credit (one course) as a student in another department who attends three classes a week. Our students were concerned about this. The need for an Honor System at Dickinson was another real concern of the students.

In the more general sessions of the morning, more controversial topics were presented by the students. Among these were changes in the grading system, lessening or elimination of distribution requirements, hiring and firing of professors, coed dormitories, students on faculty committees with vote, complete control of the social rules and permission for the Editor of the Dickinsonian and the Student Director of the College Radio Station WDCV to attend faculty meetings.

STUDENTS on many campuses, including Dickinson, are quite impatient and want changes quickly. Many of our students are not mature enough, it seems to me, and do not have the experience to plan the curriculum, decide the policy of the College for the future, select faculty and what seems to some of us take complete charge of running the institution.

Declare Day gave the students an opportunity to "communicate" with the faculty. We listened. Some changes will be made. In spite of the fact that many students are of the opinion that they should not listen to anyone over thirty, it is possible that Declare Day may not bring all the changes the impatience and immaturity of youth demand. Time will tell. Let's not throw away the old because it is old. Let's take the best of the past, introduce new ideas that are intelligent and sane, and build a better Dickinson for the future.

By Merle F. Allshouse, Ph.D.
Associate Dean of the College

ON March fifth Dickinson College's faculty held its first joint open meeting with the Student Senate as the climax of DECLARE Day. The spirit of openness and exchange that was represented at this meeting was characteristic of the DECLARE Day program from its inception.

These past two years many college administrators across the country have been scrambling to out-flank the rapidly shifting student revolution. I believe the central impact of this genuine revolution has been that virtually all of American higher education has been forced to examine its relevance to the emerging twenty-first century.

IT IS NOT the case that students today are simply rebelling in different and more visible ways than older generations and that they will sooner or later come around to the same reality principle shared by the majority of American society. That kind of wishful thinking is actually a betrayal of what one might call the new reality principle that is emerging in our society today. This new principle is simply that we live in a world society that sooner or later must learn to make humane values primary. It is for this world society, with all of its ambiguities, rather than a parochial and static society, that many of Dickinson's students seek to be educated today.

DECLARE Day was focused on the learning process. Questions such as What does an education mean? What is it for? What does a Dickinson degree mean? What kinds of learning situations are most relevant for coming to grips with reality in the various ways in which it is encountered? Questions such as these were paramount on the minds of students and faculty who planned the program. Throughout the DECLARE Day program, the administration's role was simply to act as a catalyst. Even at an institution as small as Dickinson, it is possible for lines of communication to be calcified and blocked. Our role was to make it clear that institutional structure does not mean rigidity and that in education, the principle of authority is not synonymous with authoritarianism. We are trying to be sensitive, too, because we agree with the principle that learning is a community action, and until persons come together to know one another as human beings, any significant education will not take place.

I think that at Dickinson we are learning to use our institutional structures for what they are, simply human instruments which make it possible in any society for the realization of humane values. This may well be an idealistic interpretation of what institutions are in our present society, but the challenge before American higher education and Dickinson College in particular is to create institutions which can in fact foreshadow the new social reality that is crucial for survival in the twenty-first century. Facing the difficulties of the years ahead is an awesome prospect; and yet, there are signs of hope in the current generation of students. DECLARE Day was simply one example of how students committed to an open future can help move those of us over thirty beyond the difficulties of the present and perhaps avoid some of the mistakes of the past.

Many concrete educational results of DECLARE Day are already evident. Next fall several new courses will be offered which are more relevant to our current society; many present courses will be taught in different ways, which hopefully will crack the image of the totalitarian classroom; departments are directly involving students in making decisions regarding course offerings; and at least one department will have students directly voting in department meetings. These changes are only a beginning of more fundamental changes that will be necessary at Dickinson during the next decade.

Men Are Never So Likely to Settle a Question Rightly as When They Discuss it Freely

By Jack Stover
President-Student Senate

"Men are never so likely to settle a question rightly as when they discuss it freely." So wrote Lord Macaulay some 150 years ago. So agreed Dickinson College on March 5, 1969. On this day, set aside by faculty, students, and administration for the discussion of campus problems, the college community took upon itself the responsibility of introspection and self-analysis. Dickinson College, the beneficiary of tempered student activism may now become the beneficiary of community participation in decision-making.

MARCH 5, 1969 did not spontaneously occur. Weeks of preparation and uncounted man-hours of work poured into an endeavor deemed significant enough to warrant the suspension of classes, the closing of the library, the cessation of student activities. Originally proposed as a means of bringing students together with other members of the Dickinson academic community, the Declare Day bore the stamps of Student Senate and faculty sponsorship. Spontaneity was present, nonetheless. It motivated nearly one thousand members of the community to attend a day of meetings which had no attendance requirements. It resulted in spirited discussion and meaningful debate. It produced proposals for changes designed to enhance the community involvement of all Dickinsonians.

Proposals for change were presented at a joint Student Senate-Faculty meeting which drew more than three hundred observers. These proposals focused on the academic concerns of Dickinson in suggesting a revamping of academic requirements and evaluation. Most importantly, the proposals included a suggestion for the granting of options to the student in determining what means of academic evaluation is best suited to his individual needs. This proposal did not include the entire elimination of any means of evaluation. Instead, it suggested that the student be permitted to choose among several means of grading such as the traditional letter grade, the pass/fail system, a strict percentage, or a written subjective evaluation rather than any letter or number assignment.

OTHER suggestions for academic changes included a proposal that the College lower the number of required distribution courses so that every student could complete these courses in his freshman year, allowing a three-year period in which he could freely develop his academic interests. This proposal is linked to another which requested that the College reconsider its course-orientation as a means of determining graduation requirements. Presently, a certain number of courses must be completed within the four-year period. The results of discussions on March 5 indicate a community concern that a better means of preparing students for graduation may be in the determination of levels of competence rather than in the number of courses completed.

Among the proposals presented to the community was a student request that a whole new system of College government be established to provide for actual student participation in decision-making. This suggestion logically follows any idea that the College is to be a participating community rather than a collection of separate, opposed groupings.

NATURALLY, the hundreds of participants did not always agree on remedies or even on the problems. The lines of division on issues did not represent a student-faculty split, much to the surprise of many students and faculty. There is honest disagreement, but there is also much agreement.

The proposals listed constitute only a portion of the results of Declare Day. The day for talking has ended, quietly but with implications for the future. Reporters have said that Dickinson's students could make bigger headlines by resorting to the violence of other campuses. I do not believe that we are concerned with headlines. I believe that this community is concerned with the academic process as it shapes us all. We choose Macaulay. Let the future judge our actions.

ED. NOTE—What remains to be printed? Just that, as we go to press with this Alumnus, an evaluating committee is still at work on the DECLARE DAY report. It is rumored that this report might reach 25 pages. I am not certain of our ability to accommodate this much copy in the summer Alumnus, but we shall make some attempt to bring you a conclusion.

Perhaps the word "conclusion" is inappropriate when one is dealing with the business of renewal, self-criticism, and reform. Likely, there is never a conclusion but rather a continual examination—with change the only constant.

I would like to think that The Day was worthwhile. Things were getting a bit tense here and rational persuasion, gratefully, turned out to be the course our more impatient students preferred rather than coercive tactics. I believe our more vocal students—even our small band of revolutionaries—wish a free and open campus. Freedom to teach, inquire and learn. They accept, however grudgingly, the implication that a free and open campus demands freedom for others of a more gentle persuasion.

Subsequently, the English #380 "A for everybody" stands up and military recruiters are not picketed. Perhaps, at Dickinson, we are indeed showing the way!

(V. J. S.)

Pauling 18th Recipient of Priestley Award

STILL another illustrious name was added to the lengthening list of scientists who hold Dickinson's much-respected Priestley Memorial Award.

Linus Pauling, who, like winners before him, has contributed significantly to the welfare of mankind through his research and discoveries, became the 18th recipient.

The 68-year old holder of two Nobel Prizes was honored specifically for achievement in the field of physical chemistry.

Dr. Pauling was hailed by an overflow audience. The grey-haired, Oregon-born genius had gotten up from a sick bed to accept the award and make a speech and, earlier, attend a dinner given by the college to honor him and his wife, Ava.

Dr. Rubendall presented the Priestley Award, which is a handsomely framed ceramic portrait medallion of Joseph Priestley. A silver plate under the medallion, cast in England by the Wedgwood Potteries, bears the recipient's name. Dr. Pauling also received $1000.

Dr. and Mrs. Pauling, who live in California, arrived on the campus the previous afternoon. The scientist then spent an hour with a group of chemistry students, talking about his work, and in the evening had dinner with some college professors. He was fighting a bad cold and remained in bed at the President's House until just time for the dinner. A campus tour and visit to the Priestley Day exhibit in the Spahr Library had to be cancelled.

Dickinson has presented its Priestley Award annually since 1952 but seldom has the ceremony attracted so many people as this year. Besides townspeople and students from other colleges, there were over 250 members of the American Chemical Society present. Society members living in the area traditionally hold their March dinner at Dickinson at this time. Their number was double that of other years, said Prof. Horace E. Rogers, '24, celebration chairman.

ASSISTING President Rubendall at the award ceremony were Dr. Richard H. Wanner, the acting dean of the college, and the dean-designate, Dr. Gerald S. Hawkins, the astronomer, who came down from Boston University to introduce Dr. Pauling.

In his informal talk with students earlier, Dr. Pauling, who received the Nobel Peace Prize in 1962 (eight years after he won the Nobel Prize in chemistry) expressed dismay at the proposal to deploy the ABM system which, he said, "is a silly idea" and would contribute more to the nation's peril than to its security.

"The United States and the other nation (Russia) already have enough missiles to kill off the other's population," he said. "If we put in a small system Russia could increase its offensive power to overcome our defense and the situation would remain constant."

He involved the militarists and said they "have a way" of getting their big budgets. He said, "While 400 Americans die each week in Vietnam, Nixon stalls on making a decision about the war. No one gets killed due to the ABM system, yet he comes out with a decision. I believe the President has his priorities wrong."

Exclaiming "how much more money are we going to waste on this monkey business?", he said he clings to the hope that the Congress will NOT approve the ABM system as indorsed by Nixon.

In his acceptance address, Dr. Pauling, who has lectured around the world against war, spoke again about peace and of his conviction that wars, "such as the one in Vietnam," have their base in economics.

Declaring that all national governments are immoral, he said that a people in the name of patriotism may do damage to other peoples.

Dr. Pauling also held that international problems of peace are connected with the distribution of the world's wealth.

"I do not know the solution to these problems but I believe solutions can be found if we work for them."

Earlier he had said that he was sure that the chance for maximum happiness comes from working for the happiness of others, and he indicated that this could apply to international relations.

Dr. Pauling commented on his recent and controversial suggestion that mental illness might be helped by optimum doses of vitamins, amino acids and certain fatty acids.

One can become psychotic from a lack of Vitamin C in the brain, he said, and then spoke of the incident in Charles Dana's popular boys' book, "Two Years Before the Mast," involving two sailors with scurvy who are cured of their body sores and mental derangement with raw potato juice obtained from a passing ship.

He said he is continuing his theoretical work in mental illness and he held out the possibility there may be a "more rational and humane way" of treating it than by the electric shock method.

Dr. Pauling's references to his own work and activities illustrated the subject of his talk which was "The Origin of Scientific Ideas."

He described the function of the subconscious as a problem-solving tool and said that science "is a search for an understanding of the world, for the truth. We hope to get closer to the truth, though we may never quite reach it."

In achieving this ideal, he said that the scientist "must look at the facts in as unbiased a way as possible and free himself from dogma."

"I was once asked 'How do you go about having good ideas?' and my answer was that you have a lot of ideas and throw away the bad ones. Train your subconscious to discard the bad ones," he suggested.

"Often a flash of inspiration gives scientists answers and ideas. Later the scientist looks for a logical derivation and often succeeds in finding one."

Stating that it is sometimes more important to find problems which should be looked at than trying to solve others, he said that he has often come upon solutions to scientific conundrums when he might have been least expected to.

He has found, he said, that it is as important to discard irrelevant facts as it is to see connections between important facts. Such connections often occur to him subconsciously when he is reading detective stories, sleeping, or doing other things unrelated to the task at hand. "Then suddenly an idea or a solution pops into my consciousness," he said. Many students mounted the platform to shake his hand after the award was presented.

A man of many moods and intense energy, he enjoyed our students

Around The Campus

Dr. Rubendall has just announced that total pledges to the Ford Challenge Campaign have reached the Six Million dollar goal.

It is extremely important that outstanding pledges be paid by June 30, as the Ford Foundation does not match on the basis of pledges, but on the basis of gifts received.

The Critical 7%

For a great many years, the push has been on. Not only at Dickinson, but at every private college that values its existence and hopes to continue to be in a position to offer quality higher education to future generations of eager, able students. The plain fact is that colleges and universities are facing a crisis—a financial crisis that severely limits the private institution in its approach to constructing for its students and faculty a desirable learning environment.

I often have been asked how the objectives of The Dickinson Fund are formulated. It is always a pleasure to respond to such a question, for the answer immediately substantiates the case for Annual Giving. The objectives represent the need. Yes, we have reached that point in the crisis situation where Annual Giving must be budgeted as an income item. No longer can it be said that such giving "provides the extras" as was the case not too many years ago, however nice that may have been. Now the Annual Giving is on a par with tuition and endowment income; it is an essential without which the institution would be faced with an operating deficit.

The truth is that Annual Giving did not gain its "essential" status overnight. As private institutions such as Dickinson with relatively small endowments sought to strengthen and advance the quality of their product, and at the same time keep the product marketable cost-wise, Annual Giving assumed an increasingly important role.

Two months ago, an alumnus forwarded an announcement that Princeton University was increasing its tuition by $200. The increase will bring Princetons tuition to $2,350, and marks the second $200 increase in little more than a year. Dickinson's tuition is testing this Ivy League range now; in 1969-70, tuition will increase to $2,000, not far short of the distinguished institution that values its Nassau Hall as we do our Old West. Yet Dickinson, on tuition alone, is in no position to compete with a college whose endowment is thirty-five times greater than ours, and whose Annual Giving is now well over the $2,000,000 mark. Yet Dickinson, devoid of such assets and with its tuition at the $2,000 level seeks many prospective students and faculty also sought by the nearby Ivy League institutions. Hopefully prospective students will find opportunities at Dickinson consistent with the level of tuition despite the financial limitations which exist.

This year, The Dickinson Fund accounts for seven percent of the educational budget of the College. If for that reason alone, it takes on an importance never imagined when the program was established in 1934. Little did the founders realize that today $285,000, a critical seven percent, is needed just to keep the College "in the black." For the sake of future generations of Dickinsonians, that's where it must stay.

	May 1	Goal
Alumni Annual Giving	$ 92,200	$142,500
Parents Annual Giving	$ 22,700	$ 32,500
Friends and Other Sources	$ 60,000	$110,000
The Dickinson Fund (Total)	$174,900	$285,000

The Critical 7% —————

Dr. Jerry B. Marion, left, a visiting research physicist, who lectured here two days, was impressed with the nuclear physics laboratory established by Dr. Howard C. Long, Chairman of the Department of Physics. This device is a multi-channel nuclear radiation analyzer.

Dickinson seniors learned about alumni affairs at a recent dinner in the Holland Union Building. Thomas Martin, third from left, was elected as the Class representative to the Alumni Council. Others who participated in the program are, left, Weston C. Overholt, Jr., '50, a trustee; Vincent J. Schafmeister, Jr., '49, alumni secretary, and John D. Hopper, '48, president of the General Alumni Association.

Barracuda Friendly in Clear Water

Students and Faculty Study in Florida Keys

BARRACUDA won't bite people if the water's clear. Only when it's murky and they mistake a human arm for a fish do they strike. But once they start feeding, watch out!

This is what Dickinson botanist Prof. Paul Biebel learned from a guide in the Florida keys, reef islands formed by centuries of coral-shell and algae deposits. Hundreds of keys lie flat and humid off Florida's east coast. One of them, Key Largo, several years ago became the scene of a play-turned-movie.

"The fellow seemed to be right," Prof. Biebel said casually. "We swam near schools of barracuda in clear water. We returned with arms and legs intact. Sec?"

The botanist's adventurous dip took place during the fun hour, one of a scant few, during Dickinson's spring recess when he and Prof. Henry Hanson, geologist, shepherded 24 perspiring Dickinson students on a week's study-holiday for a look-see at southern Florida's rocks and plant life.

Later, sloshing around in shallow water, "We had a look at some of those reefs," said Prof. Hanson, who took nine students on a three-week junket to Iceland's boiling springs and extinct volcanoes last summer. (Fall 1968 Alumnus.)

"Some of these coral fields have been building up for millenia at the rate of a few millimeters a year. That's slow going, but you've got to remember it's a steady process. You'd be surprised how a coral reef can rise in the world after a couple million years of serious attention to business."

Most of the students had never seen a coral reef before. But what really surprised them, Prof. Hanson said, was the similarity of a "reef" in nearby New Bloomfield. Located in a range of Pennsylvania hills 600 feet above sea level, the Perry County "reef" of disintegrated limestone was formed in what geologists call the Silurian period, famous for its coral deposits and scorpions. Perpetually restless, the earth has done a lot of heaving and settling since then, Prof. Hanson explained.

Prof. Biebel, who experienced a moment of rare botanical excitement when he found a species of seaweed called acetabularia growing in its natural environment, agrees with Prof. Hanson that the most informative part of the trip was a day's tour of the Everglades. Often used as an illustration in text books, acetabularia is seldom encountered by laboratory biologists in nature.

RECENTLY blackened by TV networks, newspapers, and magazines as a national disgrace, the Everglades is the world's largest underground river (with much of its surface above ground) and the locale of many unique plant and animal species. Lately it's been drying up. Deprived of water, some species have already vanished—"millions of years of evolution gone in a summer's indifference," says Prof. Biebel—and others are threatened with extinction.

"It happened because they've been draining off the water to feed Miami reservoirs for the mushrooming population down there," he said.

Measures are not under study, he said to save the area and "its fascinating creatures. Let's hope human greed doesn't get the better of needed action."

But, he said, the approaching dessication of the Everglades isn't the area's only problem. The other is alligators.

"Or rather poachers. The alligators are being decimated. The poachers get seven dollars a running foot for alligator hides. They skin them and run the hides up to New York. Other cities, too. An average hide brings in about $100."

Everglade alligators, he said, are distinct from other varieties.

"The way to stop this rapacious nonsense," he said, "is to make products manufactured from alligator hides illegal. When will that be done? Who knows? Besides, by then it may be too late."

The group traveled in a five-car-non-stop caravan, spelling each other at the wheel, and returned the same way.

"We made record time," said Mike Hozik, geology major and one of the 24 trippers who made up the group. Twenty-eight hours each way. But the roads were better than those pockmarked trails we pounded over with Prof. Hanson last summer in Iceland."

After a reminiscent moment, he added: "There's another thing too. They were a lot more crowded."

Moments after he had learned that the College had received the Pennsylvania Nurserymen's Award in recognition of outstanding aesthetic achievement in landscaping and beautification, Dr. Rubendall was advised by John McElwee, left, and William Conran, of Howell Lewis Shea Associates, that the architectural firm had received their professional association's highest compliment for design of the Boyd Lee Spahr Library.

Great to be a Winner

Sports

Ted Jursek, captain of the basketball team is 6-4. He had an average of 14.4 points, collected many rebounds, and led the Red Devils into the Middle Atlantic Conference playoffs. A junior, he is expected to lead Coach Dave Watkins' into serious contention for the Southern Division Title next year.

Henri Rauschenbach won eight of his ten wrestling bouts this season and represented the College in the Middle Atlantic Championships. A senior and Dickinson's only three-sport athlete, Rauschenbach was co-captain of the team.

Dave Zeski, a College All-American in his sophomore year, successfully defended his 100-yard and 200-yard Breaststroke titles in the Middle Atlantic Conference Division and set new Dickinson records in the 200-yard Individual Medley event (2:14.0) and 200-yard Breaststroke (2:23.0). Counting the 50- and 100-yard Freestyle marks he set last year as a freshman, he now holds four school records, a feat never before equalled by a Red Devil swimmer. His record earned Zeski an invitation to the NCAA National College Championships.

Alumni Notes

Dr. Frederick D. Wertz, '37, and his wife, Betty, react to the announcement that he is now Bishop Wertz, of the West Virginia Area, The Methodist Church. Vernon Drive, 25314.

Colbert N. Kurokawa

(Ed.—Colbert Kurokawa, '22, recently became a Life Member of the Alumni Association. He is Liaison Secretary for the International Interfaith Fellowship of Kyoto.)

Dear Friends:

Ever since I received Doc. Kruse's note of Feb. 25, I have been trying to share in the fund-raising, but too much of "red-tapes" at the local bank,—due to the government tightening the "Yen Exodus" and was on the verge of giving-up this year.

Just then, I received $5. in currency for my space-rate article from a newspaper in America. So I decided to send it to the Dickinson Fund,—as a sort of "widow's mite."

The colleges in Japan,—perhaps more than in the USA—are having their share of difficulty, particularly in finance. Only this morning's vernaculars report that some of the private high schools are

We Cannot Help But Suppose There Must be a Power Behind the Curtain and the Students Made to Act as Puppet Dolls

confronted with the students general strike, protesting against "10% increase in tuition so as to defray the increasing pay for their teachers. Such a trend, I am afraid, being fanned by the violent agitation among nearly 40 universities, including 12 national universities, including Tokyo Univ. (formerly the Imperial Univ., the highest institution of the land, which was occupied by the agitating students nearly a month.)

We thought the agitation, genuine voice of the youth, demanding to improve the educational policy of the Dept. of Education, which even us felt a need of revamping some of its policy; and thus, we felt, at first, the agitation was an expression of the youth for an improvement.

BUT as Nippon Univ. (a private) and the largest in the country, and Tokyo Univ. were occupied—the former nearly a year, while the latter over a month—blocading the entire premises, besieged;

we were led to suspect a deeper motives of the violent students. Such a suspicion was varied when we saw a flag of "Sickle & Hammer" over the top of the main building; and a portrait of Mau Tse Tung was hung at the entrance of the bldg.

Large regiments of police forces subdued,—expelled—the students, one univ. after another. Just as soon as the people became relieved of the disturbance, the flying-sparks of the similar violence seem to have ignited at high schools! We cannot help but suppose "there must be a power-behind the curtain" and the students are made to act as puppet-dolls.

We sincerely hope and pray that our supposition be incorrect, though we know one thing sure: Japan, too, is now sharing world-prevailing commotion and upheavall thus chasing peace and tranquility farther away from our earth!

Sincerely Yours,

/s/ Colbert N. Kurokawa

Frank E. Masland, Jr., '18, right, receives from Secretary of the Department of the Interior, Walter J. Hickel, the Department's Conservation Service Award in ceremonies honoring the former chairman of the Advisory Board on National Parks, Historic Sites, Buildings and Monuments. A member of the executive committee of the National Parks Association, Mr. Masland won international recognition for his work in the conservation of natural resources. Currently, he serves the State of Pennsylvania as a member of the Fish Commission. He is the Chairman of the Board of C. H. Masland & Sons.

New Dean Noted Astronomer; Decoded Stonehenge

Dickinson's dean-designate anticipates no great trouble making the transition from a big university in a bustling urban setting to a small liberal arts college in a near-rural environment.

Dr. Gerald S. Hawkins of Boston University takes over his new role at the College July 1.

He and his attractive wife, Dorothy, have just finished a visit to Carlisle and the College.

They came down from Boston for the Priestley Day celebration. Dr. Hawkins, a widely known astronomer and writer, had been invited to introduce Professor Linus Pauling, the Nobel laureate, at the presentation of the Priestley Memorial Award, always the highlight of the annual celebration.

The 42-year-old scholar-astronomer first visited Carlisle about five years ago when he lectured at the Army War College's National Strategy Seminar.

Mrs. Hawkins, a former New Yorker and mother of two young daughters, said she and her husband have come "to like Carlisle very much."

"The countryside is so very attractive—the farms and all," she remarked. "We are much impressed by the community."

On their recent visit they met a number of student leaders. A luncheon arranged by Dr. Howard L. Rudendall, Dickinson president, and Mrs. Rubendall and held at the Rubendalls, brought the Hawkins together with the heads of the campus newspaper and radio station and officers of the Student Senate.

"It is most important to get together with students," said Dr. Hawkins. "I have to listen as much as possible and make certain I am hearing all voices and getting to know as many aspects of the College as possible."

He is not worried about making the jump from Boston to Carlisle, from the university to the small college.

"My problem will not be one of adjustment. My problem will be the ongoing concerns of Dickinson College. A large university is a place for testing the many and great problems that confront it. A small campus is where everyone has a prospect of taking part in the problem solving process."

Dr. Hawkins, who was born and educated in England, has been at Boston University since 1957, presently serving as chairman of the department of astronomy and director of the university's observatory. He is better known as the astronomer of the Smithsonian Astrophysical Observatory in Cambridge, Mass., and research associate at the Harvard College Observatory, Boston.

He is the author of six books. One of the six, "Stonehenge Decoded," has brought him international recognition. In it he claims that the ancient cluster of giant stones in southern England, known as Stonehenge, was a sophisticated astronomical "observatory" and not just a Bronze Age temple as many scientists have held.
