A PHOENIX IN MY YOUTH

I Knew a Phoenix in My Youth. Yeats

Professor Philip N. Lockhart's reference to that legendary Egyptian bird, which was consumed in fire by its own act then rose in youthful freshness from its own ashes, is an appropriate one. In their day the classics were the symbol of the esotericism of the liberal arts. In the years after World War I, classical studies became the flunk-out course for the professions. At Dickinson the classics are alive and vigorous again because of Wings, Lockharts, Noddors, Siders. Dickinson students confirmed the Lockhart influence by naming him the first recipient of the Ganoe Award (a memorial to Col. William A. Ganoe, '02), presented to "that member of the faculty, who by vote of the Senior Class, is adjudged the most inspirational teacher during their college course."

"We Got Whupped!"

Was it Faulkner who, when asked why there are so many more great novelists in the South than in the North, answered with no hesitation, "'Cause we got whupped!'"? If I had to give one reason for the rise of interest in classical languages and literature at Dickinson or any other college, I should say the same thing. Today, just as in the Renaissance, wherever the classics are alive and vigorous, it is probably because they got whupped and neglected and rediscovered by someone still able to be excited about them.

WHEN, on the other hand, Latin and Greek studies ruled as monarchs of the humanities, their scholarship became more and more haughty, ever and ever more picayune, and deader by the decade. Pick up any school Latin text from the old days, and what do you find? Scrawled inside the cover is always that inevitable scrap of doggerel about Latin, the dead tongue, that killed the Romans "and now it's killing me." These verses were not, however, written in the fifties or even, in general, the forties; they came rather from the textbooks of the Class of 1910. For by the 1930's on most campuses the classics, with a little help from Dewey-eyed educationists, had succeeded in killing not only the students but themselves. In many ways it was a consummation devoutly to be wished.

In their day, of course, the classics were the symbol of the esotericism of the liberal arts. The idea of liberal arts grew up, let us never forget, in the late Roman Empire when the liberi, the free, were a minority. The revolutions of the Eighteenth Century threatened the minority nature of the free—you remember the little colonial girl with her cow, "Free-'n'-Equal"—but they never threatened the minority quality of the educated. As the American frontier progressed and finally closed, all Americans were able to enjoy free land, then paychecks, then a home of one's own, the rather circular marks of freedom. But a college education was neither desired by all nor legislated for all. Even after the land-grant bills threatened to send every Free-'n'-Equal cow to college, it was the professions that held out for a liberal education as the preparation for their esoteric, not to say occult, minorities. Calculus and Greek: these were the two intellectual initiation ceremonies that the aspiring minister or doctor had to pass through in order to gain access to his profession. Something had to serve as a weedout course, and these rigors served as well as any.

IT IS NOT too much to say that the single greatest boon to classical studies is their relief from duty, in the years after World War I, as the flunk-out course for the professions. I suspect the same might be said for the calculus. Today only medicine is a competitive enough profession to need a weedout course on the undergraduate level. This distasteful but necessary job has been, on most campuses, dropped into two unwilling laps: Elementary Biology and Analytical or Organic Chemistry. Let both fields be forewarned, by the field that did the dirty work for so long, that they have taken on the most stultifying and thankless job in higher education.

As we all know, Dickinson at her foundation partook of some of the revolutionary and frontier spirit. Still, like her godfather, John Dickinson, she did not rock the boat just for any pleasant dizzying sensation that rocking might give. Anyway, her foundation as a college came between the American revolution, with its chiefly political effects on the world, and the French one, where the real intellectual changes begin. The two outstanding professors in the original staff of five were Charles Nisbet, the theologian, and James Ross, the classical philologist; both were classicists of the famous Scottish school. The classics were the core of the original Dickinson College curriculum, and no one was to question seriously their place for a century to come.

For Dickinson seems from the first to have been unabashedly forward-looking in developing the sciences, liberal in her theology, and bold in espousing the social sciences. Yet in the humanities—which she always regarded as central to education—conservatism reigned throughout the Nineteenth Century. Defying Alexander Pope two ways, Dickinson was both among the first by whom new subjects were tried and, on the other hand, among the very last to lay aside the old requirements.

Late in the forties, though, the inevitable happened, the Latin requirement was dropped. This must have seemed to many alumni and some professors, not all of them classicists, a shameful break with a century and a half of tradition. I am afraid that it was actually a long overdue change and one not at all to be regretted, least of all by today's classics professor. After a generation of defensive warfare, classicists, if not the classics, were tired. Probably both deserved a rest; in any case, both got it.

JUST as they had done for a millennium in the monasteries of Europe, the Greek and Latin classics sat on the shelves of college libraries, waiting to be rediscovered. The experience was not a new one for them. Yet, despite it all, Ovid was still the same Ovid who had inspired the Canterbury Tales, and Plautus was none other than the idol of the young playwright who started a career with The Comedy of Errors. Freud was still incomprehensible without Plato, and Bergson without the butchered but haunting fragments of Heraclitus.

Inspiration: that was the mysterious power that the classics had always possessed, the ability to breathe into a man talents that had never been there before. They had not long been dropped from the curriculum when there were murmurings that inspiration was gone, too, from literature in particular but from education in general. Those rumblings are not all passed today. When the late Col. William Ganoe, '02, left his estate for the propagation of inspiring teaching at Dickinson College, he must have been thinking of the teachers of his own youth, men like Mervin Filler, who had recently left the Preparatory School to begin his long career with the College. At the same time, consciously or not, Col. Ganoe was thinking of the seche and somber field that Dr. Filler professed. The oldtimers thought, I am sure, that anyone who could make Latin and Greek live must have the powers of a warlock. That is just where they were wrong. The magic is all in the texts and the inspiration comes from the words. Then, as now,

THOMAS DESILVER, JUN. No. 247, MARKET-STREET.

James Ross, first professor of Latin at Dickinson, won national stature by writing a usable school grammar. Today students study some of their grammar within walking distance of the famous lupa in the Capitoline Museum, with the grandeur that was Rome surrounding them. Many Dickinson freshmen come in as veterans of high school Latin trips to Rome.

if the teacher will only keep his mouth shut and defer to Vergil and Euripides, he has it made. This allows for the inspiration that the classics have shown in more generations than English and Russian and French literature, all piled together, have existed. To me it is the outstanding mystery of humane education, the phoenix of my now-departed youth.

[Author's note: This paragraph was written before I faced the shock of being the first recipient of the Ganoë award. The thrill of it has not blinded me to the fact that the prize really goes, jointly, to Vergil and Plato or Euripides. I accept it, humbly and gratefully, in their name.]

The Classics Department at Dickinson is dedicated to the proposition that nothing yet produced in the rest of the world can replace the European intellectual tradition, be it African strong man, Asian guru or East Slavic enterpriser. Not every member of the college faculty holds with this rather Victorian point of view, but we believe that even our own century's unhappy history leaves a burden of proof on the anti-European. We further believe (and here our company becomes smaller still) that the core and carrier of that tradition is still the classical languages. These alone speak to all European peoples, whether their native tongue be Romance, Germanic or modern Greek; whether they live in Denmark or Montevideo, in Chicago or Rumania. European mythology is Greek mythology, as French poets keep reminding us; European literature (and this includes American literature) is classical literature, by the testimony of Ezra Pound, Robert Frost, Eliot and Housman, Robert Lowell and W. H. Auden, to take only the leaders of our own vernacular. Every major poet in our tongue during this century has expressed his debt to classical literature.

One unpublished statement of it comes from Dickinson College lore. When Frost came to the campus in the spring of 1959 to receive the first Dickinson College Arts Award, Professor Schiffman met him in Philadelphia. This most American of Poets asked seriously about the state of intellectual things at the College, and Joe Schiffman told him about successful graduate students in English and creative works on the campus. After a polite period of listening, Frost finally broke in, "Really, I don't give a damn about all this; what I wanted to know is: how are things going with Latin?" It was another reminder that Horace and Catullus stand behind his poems of deepest New England gray, that here is another Yankee who is straight from Olympus.

If the report on Latin at Dickinson was not too hopeful in 1959, it was only two years later that the mood began to change. Then my colleague, Stanley Nodder, Jr., came to the College at just the same time as an energetic group of students who had the radical idea that they might like to major in Latin, the subject that had meant most to them in high school. They were a pioneering crew, starting with Joan Taussig Lowell '63 and Pete Frese '64, then the powerful crowd of '65: Barbara Fenn Leslie, Andy Hecker, Pat Miller Gable, Ann Smith Snyder and Joyce Wise Shapiro. These alumni, more than anyone else, are responsible for the Latin phoenix at Dickinson. Some of the readers of this article may feel that, of all the changes in the College during the sixties, the least desirable is the rebirth of Classical Studies. At any rate, though, it's different.

Was difference all that mattered to these students and their followers in the sixties? Were the classics just a stuffer version of pot, a traditionalist answer to yoga? Or were Latin and Greek, omen absit, something even less respectable: part of the decade's search for relevance, that word that by 1970 brings a retch from every educator? Sheepishly, I admit that it was, indeed, the relevance of Rome that appealed to these young people. If that is a taint, again I say that it's a new one.

WHAT has been the problem of the sixties for America? It takes no sophistication to answer that one in 1969: it is making disparate groups live together in the city. Let us not forget, however, that it was the undergraduates of the sixties that helped us define this problem; the alumni mentioned above did their share in the early years of the decade. They stopped to realize that there was one civilization and only one that faced and solved this same problem in the past. That is the Roman Empire. For three hundred and fifty years, just about the length of white habitation on the American continent, Rome operated an integrated urban system that tied together the Mediterranean world and created the European civilization to which we, the second great urban ethos, are heir. Race, as we know the problem, was not one of the chief questions of the time; there was nothing in the human physiognomy that could set up between men a barrier at the first glance. At the same time, there was one tremendous barrier that Rome besieged for just the length of time we have mentioned and to which after three centuries, she lost. This was the difference of language between the East and the West.

In the first years of the Christian era the ring of the Greek tongue, with its vestiges of oldtime pitch accent, must have set off the Latin speaker just as quickly as the pigmentation of a face can today. St. Paul is more convicted than convincing when he insists that there is no difference between the Jew and the Greek; in any case, he had not learned this idea from either of these great traditions but from the Romans who made his world gospel possible. Rome's great contribution to history was not a Wehrmacht or even a system of slick civil service publicans, but an educational system that allowed Latin and Greek to maintain their individuality, while forcing them to get along together.

Prof. Robert Sider talks over student progress with Chris Werner, '69, assistant in Intermediate Latin. The student assistant takes full charge of grammar review, freeing class time for reading and explanation of Cicero's essays. In this case, conversation runs sometimes to Oxford, since Prof. Sider is a Rhodes Scholar and Chris was Dickinson's 1969 candidate for the Rhodes.

If you want a symbol of the greatness of Rome, forget Cecil B. DeMille and look at a scrap of papyrus found in Egypt a generation ago. It is a school-boy trot, a word-for-word translation of Vergil's Aeneid into Greek, just like the interlinears that many of you readers left in Carlisle's second-hand book shops at the end of your B.A. Latin requirement. These unhappy Greek kids from the rich farmland of the Fayum had just as much trouble with Latin syntax as you did, and no Ph.B. to turn to as a final recourse! But they had to face it, for their fathers had asked Rome to make the world peaceful. The Roman magister, not the legionary or the tax-collector, made the Empire work, for he made it civilized. The school-boy had to learn enough Latin to read Vergil's Aeneid, the imperial Bible. One of the first literary figures he met was the new world citizen, Aeneas; one of the first lines he translated had to do with building a city: dum conderet urbem.

AT DICKINSON we teach a Latin course as nearly as possible like that of our anonymous Egyptian-Greek school-boy. Vergil is the center of our program and Aeneas, the unheroic hero, its ideal. Here was a man whose adult life had been lived through a war that alternated between hot and cold, as the epic tradition pictured it. All he had ever known was a defensive struggle to preserve the great civilization of Troy; this was the life-work of his generation. After ten years, however, he had to face the appalling fact that many of the dead had died in vain, that Troy could not be saved by arms. Taking a commonplace icon of his time, Vergil makes it universal. Aeneas, fleeing from the burning Troy with his father and penates (household gods) on his shoulder, his son Ascanius trotting at his side: this becomes the symbol of all of us who have a remnant of a world to preserve for the future. The awful lesson that Aeneas has to learn is that old-time heroism that dies merely for the cause is not enough, that it is only in the sacrifice of one's own self-realization that the race can go on. At the same time, Vergil is no party-line pacifist; even after his education, symbolized by a descent into hell, Aeneas is dragged back into battle and made to fight one last time, just to wipe out vestiges of a false ideology. The final question, and the thorniest, in the second half of the Aeneid is the one faced by every undergraduate, every citizen, today: how do you tell when that one clear call for a return to battle has come? Aeneas figures it out only through the hell of a college education and a mystic vision of future history, gained from "incubating" at the site of Rome itself. Certainly the dilemma, if not always Vergil's answer, is easy to sell to undergraduates who are facing it themselves.

Not all of our studies are so paradoxical or so abstract. The study of the classics has spread with the current acceptance of travel and study abroad as a way of life. Modern Italy and Greece have always added to the appeal of the classics. If Chaucer and Byron and Goethe, or, in a different mood, Lord Elgin and George Dennis, had never visited the Mediterranean, the history of the classical tradition would have been very different. It was no accident that the classics lasted with more vigor through the depression in the wealthy eastern colleges, home of the Grand Tour mentality, than in the Mid- and Far West, land of the American touring car, and of the slogans "See America First" and just plain "America First." These slogans were not good for the study of the classics. Today, however, Stanford and Lake Forest and Sweet Briar have wrested from their northeastern sisters the lead in international education. These colleges are producing a generation of students that actually look down their Sorbonne-trained noses at the Grand Tour boys from the East, who tried to see it all in a summer. The junior year abroad has certainly increased American interest in the Bronze Age and Etruscology. Dickinson students living within walking distance of the Villanovan Museum in Bologna are in danger of getting hooked on Iron Age archaeology, though, so far as I know, they have so far resisted it.

Actually, classical philology and ancient history have been the pioneer fields for study abroad. That magnificent brahmin, Charles Eliot Norton, was the first man to conceive of taking American education to Europe instead of sending American students off for a European education. He had already spearheaded the foundation of the Archaeological Institute of America when he conceived in 1882 of an American School in Athens, the first such project in the country's history. The School was a generation old when Dickinson's Herbert Wing, Jr., studied there in 1913-14. Meanwhile, a similar graduate program had come to be offered in Rome at the American Academy; the latter, however, was not limited to classical studies but had as well a School of Fine Arts, with work in architecture, painting, sculpture, landscape architecture and musical composition. Thus the leaders in Latin philology have always had the healthy presence of the finest young creative artists; at the same time, many of the most vital movements in the fine arts during the last twenty years have been moulded in buildings shared by students of Tacitus and the Ara Pacis. During the spring of 1969 Professor Posey of Dickinson's music department was in residence at the School of Fine Arts of the American Academy in Rome.

GRADUATES of the Academy, teaching at colleges across the land, have for a long time coveted for their undergraduate students the same experience they enjoyed only on the graduate level. About 1965 their dreams began to come true in the founding of the Intercollegiate Center for Classical Studies in Rome. Here Latin majors can study, within sight of the Tiber, under professors from their own and similar American college departments. The instruction and standards are American, creating no language or scholarly barriers; but the setting is as authentically Roman as that of the Academy itself. Dickinson joined the Center in the second year of its operation and has sent two Latin majors to it. Both have received scholarship help from the Center to make Rome study possible. John Skilton ('68) took one term of his senior year at the ICCS; this fall Sue Rosenfeld ('70) is spending her second semester in Rome, coming back then to complete the final semester of her graduation year. Here they have had, in addition to the matchless surroundings of Rome, the benefit of superior professors from Agnes Scott and Oberlin Colleges, the Universities of California and Michigan. We hope that many more students will enjoy this privilege in the future.

One other boon to Latin and Greek studies in the sixties has been this College's movements toward Independent Studies and honors programs. Nothing in six years of teaching classics here has been more pleasurable than directing seniors honors research. Every student who received major honors in the department has been a joy, but I might be allowed to single out a few of the papers for special mention. For originality of conclusion, Pat Miller Gable '65 takes first place. She proved successfully that Ovid's Fasti, always considered unfinished because it deals with six months out of a Roman twelve-month year, is instead a complete work, with a unity based on Roman liturgy rather than time-reckoning. Steve Felsher this year wrote a study of Theophrastus that, for breadth of scholarship and mastery of bibliography, stands up to anything in English on the subject. The palm for intellectual maturity goes to Ed Phillips '67 and his essay on the Platonic tradition through Cicero, Vergil, St. Augustine, Ficino and Spenser. Ed is back at his alma mater this year, teaching a seminar on the ancient city, that grows partly out of this study. For sheer brilliance of reasoning, though, we shall always remember Doris Detweiler Ormsby's '66 work on Cicero's Timaetus; no wonder her Latin instructor wanted to marry her, and did.

"Who, in God's Name . . .?"

It was in the laundromat, one day last spring, that my wife met the wife of a department chairman from a nearby college. They began one of those chats about wifely woes and found that theirs matched surprisingly well. The reason, it turned out, was that both were married to professors. The other lady confessed that her husband headed an English department, but she was still not prepared to learn that my wife was married to a Latin professor. Her reaction was quick and to the point: "Who in God's Name, studies Latin these days?"

A good question, and one in the mind of anyone who has read along this far. I shall try to answer it (avoiding the expletive) in terms of, "Who majors in Latin these days?" Including the Class of '71, that would be almost fifty Dickinsonians in the last seven years; we average a little better than a half-dozen majors per class.

IT WOULD be easy to say that the leaders of the campus study Latin and smugly let it go at that. Happily, though, that answer would reflect neither our philosophy nor the facts. We do have a line of outstanding, yes, really great, young alumni. There are Student Senate officers, a president and a secretary in the group; and hats of various colors, leaning chiefly toward the blue. Three Sophisters in seven years are, we admit, our pride and joy, backed by numerous Phi Beta Kappa laureates. Our majors—please try to conceal your shock—have won letters in football, basketball, and baseball; and half the candidates for Homecoming Queen one year were either majors or minors in Latin. (So far as gender goes among our majors, the men outnumber the women by just a little.) Ed Phillips '67 is one of Dickinson's Woodrow Wilson winners; and Steve Felsher this spring was named to the first class of Watson Foundation Traveling Fellows, for a year of travel and study in Greece. In each of the last five years there has been a Latin major elected to Omicron Delta Kappa, the national leadership honor society.

AT THE same time, there are Latin and Greek majors with very short subtitles under their pictures in the Microcosm. In other words we have leaders and followers and a fairly impressive line of those independent souls who incline to neither category. Their real unity is their interest in the classics.

Religiously, our students come from almost every faith represented on the campus. I admit, though, that in this respect Dickinson has never quite been able to live up to my favorite undergraduate seminar at Penn. There were six in the seminar that year: an agnostic, a Presbyterian, a Reformed Jew, an ex-Franciscan, a Swedenborgian and a Mormon—probably as ecumenical a class as any in the history of Latin teaching. (I mention this to combat the idea, shared unfortunately by the Pennsylvania State Legislature, that somehow Latin is a denominational language.) Our ecumenicity is milder but real. The three honors majors this year represent the three great faiths of our country. A Benedictine-trained Catholic from Washington, D.C., a Jew from Bronx Science High School, and a Methodist pretheolog from a public high school in Iowa: each found in Latin or Greek an intellectual equivalent for his faith.

The other question our majors have to answer hebdomadally (unless they give up, as one has while working in public relations this summer, and pretend to be English majors) is, "What are you going to do with your Latin?" (The italics are decidedly those of the speaker.) Now, personally, I agree with my colleague who tells his students, "A liberal education is intended to unfit you for life!" Still, I can tell you what our majors in recent years have done after graduation, ignoring those who are in graduate school and still have to face the critic's question themselves.

WE HAVE not produced as many Latin teachers as we might have hoped to help meet the shortages in that field. At the same time, it is gratifying to see that three or four teachers have come from the ranks of those who took Latin just for enjoyment's sake. One young man is still enjoying his Latin, with a vengeance. During spring vacation his senior year he went for an interview at the Buffalo Seminary; it was only ten minutes before the interview with the headmaster that he realized, from a yearbook on the coffee table, that it was a young lady's seminary. He got the job and, as the school's only bachelor teacher, is the center of some interest there.

Many of the recent graduates are not, of course, "doing" anything with their Latin. They are in or through top-flight professional schools—law, medicine, drama, social work; they are selling jewelry and bringing up babies; they are serving their country in posts of authority in Germany and Viet Nam. They are doing the same things that majors in Political Science, Physics and English are doing, probably no better and no worse. Sometimes they write home from the service for their college Vergil texts, much as the Alsops used to read Xenophon when out on some journalistic assignment; sometimes, on the other hand, they contribute these same texts to the sidewalk sales. But, almost to a man, they meet others who admit that they, too, have majored in the classics, and they find a bond that transcends generation gaps, divisions of creed and differences of calling. What are they doing with Latin and Greek? I guess they are enjoying whatever inspiration they offered and, sometimes at least, talking about them. Occasionally, I meet them trying to bring back a phrase from Juvenal or an image from Propertius or a concept from the Euthyphro. (Now how did those triangles work?) This, it seems to me, would have been enough to satisfy Socrates or Cicero, who attempted to establish for all time man as the discussing animal. It would have satisfied the founding fathers of Dickinson College, who, beside being embattled farmers, literally talked a new nation into existence. And it satisfies this one professor of the classics today.

CONCLUSION

If we have had a renaissance of the classics at Dickinson, and “renaissance” is an awfully big word to live up to, it is only because we first got whopped, by the sciences, later by the social studies, finally by what seemed like more modern humanities. None of us in the department is, fortunately, old enough that he had to live through that whopping. If ours is to be a phoenix generation, we should do well not to forget the fires from which we rise. Each of the three members of the department gave up some other field to take part in the rebirth. Prof. Nodder came from history and New Testament studies; Prof. Robert Sider, the only undergraduate classics major of the three, had taken a doctorate in patristics at Oxford; and your writer began his career teaching English and science. We have, in other words, reversed the trend of a generation ago, when classicists were secretly taking law degrees for that day when their subjects would be taught no more. We have been lucky and our students have been lucky; both are grateful to the generations that took it on the chin.

We do not fail to remember Pharaoh's cows in our planning for the future. There probably never have been in history any seven fat years that could not have been swallowed up by seven lean ones to follow. At the very best, plateaus will occur. All the same we are full of hopes and unfulfilled plans. One of the latter may come to fruition next summer in the addition of a Dickinson Classical Institute to the current ones in Indic and German studies, where on-the-spot education puts time and space back together again.

When some new whopping seems imminent, I think of the Pittsburgh high school teacher who stood up in one of the mournful hand-wringing sessions that Latin teachers are heir to. This teacher gave a shrug and declared, “I don't bother worrying about people who want to get rid of Latin. They've been working at it for a thousand years and haven't succeeded yet!”

Dorothy Sayers puts it even better in The Mind of the Maker:

It is the business of education to wait upon Pentecost . . . But Pentecost will happen, whether within or without official education.

So be it, and long live the spirit of James Ross.

PHILIP N. LOCKHART

About the Author

“Literally hundreds of his former and present colleagues and students attest to the excellence of his teaching. He has a unique ability to communicate with students and to stimulate thought.”

Such an accolade, freely and often heard on the Dickinson Campus characterizes the author, Philip North Lockhart, who joined the Department of Classical Languages as Associate Professor in 1963. Even the student course guide gives a rating of excellent, not only to the course described—Roman Historians—but also to its professor, a dual kudos seldom bestowed.

Dr. Lockhart did his undergraduate work at the University of Pennsylvania and continued his education in the Classics at North Carolina and Yale. Before coming to Dickinson, he was Assistant Professor of Classical Studies at his alma mater. In 1965 he was elected to chair The Department of Classical Languages. His promotion to the rank of Professor came in 1968, the same year his colleagues elected him to the esteemed position of Secretary of Faculty. In June 1969, members of the senior class voted him the “most inspirational teacher” and presented him with the College's first Ganoe Award.

Frequently recognized for contributions off campus, Lockhart has served as President of the Philadelphia Classical Society and has headed the Pennsylvania State Association of Classical Teachers. He is also a member of the Executive Committee of the Classical Association of the Atlantic States. Lockhart has published widely, again with distinction.

For the 1969/70 academic year, Lockhart has been named Visiting Professor of Classical Studies at Ohio State University in Columbus. He will return to Carlisle in September 1970 with his wife and two children, Bruce, 9, and Betsy, 7.

Splendor

Hawkins, Gerald S., Splendor in the Sky. Revised. Harper

Read under the full pressure of its implications, Gerald S. Hawkins' Splendor in the Sky (Harper's, $8.95), republished this spring in a revised edition, is a humbling book. Our guess is that the College's new dean, who at this writing has made only two official appearances on campus—one to introduce Linus Pauling, winner of Dickinson's eighteenth Priestley award in science, the other to address members of the local chapter of the American Association of University Professors—had no special intention of leaving in the reader's mind a deposit of philosophic reflections. Nevertheless, that is the effect, on one reader at least, of his reborn volume.

Dr. Hawkins is a man of fertile scholarship. Research astronomer at the Smithsonian Astrophysical Observatory and until this summer chairman of Boston University's department of astronomy, he has published the better part of a hundred papers and, since its original publication in 1961, followed Splendor in the Sky with five other volumes, of which the best known is Stonehenge Decoded, a Book-of-the-Month Club selection. In its present version, Splendor benefits from additions and revisions spliced in to include commentary on astronomical discoveries and theories—the current speculations on the nature of pulsars, for instance—talked up over the last decade. And alike all scientific publications these last few years, it already begins to lose some of its lustre, for since its second coming the pulsar question has been reopened, and revised, at one more association meeting of the astronomers, this time in Washington. A scientist who seems to feel comfortable with outside mysteries (our galaxy, he tells us, contains a billion stars), Dr. Hawkins—or so one would suppose—remains undismayed. Not for well over a century have Aristotle and the Bible had the power of slowing down the pace of scientific discovery. Like our planet's population, science's growth seems, not merely geometric, but exponential. The fact that after only eight years of silence Dr. Hawkins has sought renewal of his stellar history is one more evidence of science's continuum.

What we have here in this contribution to the Hawkins canon is a deliberately middle-brow (the most difficult of all tones to achieve) review of man's miscalculations and discoveries in astronomy. We see him as a somewhat gifted animal creeping about a planet which circles a mediocre star. The mediocre star is our sun. Since pre-Babylonian days, stargazers have been curious about the heavens and have been searching out the enigma of their astral environment. But like primitive medicine men, who cast out devils to get rid of malaria, the night-watchers, except for some brilliant speculators—Aristotle and Pythagoras, among others, thought the world was round—created "sciences" consistent within themselves but grotesquely at variance with the laws of physics. Ptolemy, the Alexandrian astronomer and geographer who flourished in the second century of our era, assumed that the sun traveled around the earth, and on that assumption built an elaborate but vulnerable theory of epicycles to explain the movements of sun, stars, and the five visible planets. It wasn't until the Renaissance, and the emergence of men like Copernicus, Kepler, Tycho Brahe, and Newton, that science began the painful process of redistributing the heavenly bodies and properly explaining their behavior.

That reshuffling, as we know now, was indeed a "trepidation of the spheres." It literally moved the earth. And man, who in the view of some historians had sometimes tended to confuse himself with God, yielded his position of centrality, in which all things revolved about him in a perpetual dance of deference, to one of marginal mediocrity. Astronomers know now, says Dean Hawkins, that the earth is in the fringes of the Milky Way, man's special parcel of astral territory, and that it is only one of the planets, whose number may run into the billions, where some form of intelligent life probably exists. Such life, if only in the form of "a brain floating around on a stalk," is presumably often superior to ours. No longer do we inhabit a Dantesque universe, with neatly topographic heavens and hells, a universe in which man is the tender preoccupation of his creator. Far from that, Dr. Hawkins' Babylon-to-redshift odyssey (the redshift being an optical betrayal of our supposedly expanding universe) reveals man as an un-resting detective, the possessor of an intelligence which seeks solutions as naturally as a plant turns to the sun, a creature who for centuries has made more wrong guesses than right and now

Born in England, Gerald S. Hawkins obtained a Ph.D. and D.Sc. from Manchester University, where he studied with Sir Bernard Lovell at Jodrell Bank. He was Professor and Chairman of the Astronomy Department at Boston University and Director of the Observatory. He is now Dean of Dickinson College and a research astronomer at the Smithsonian Astrophysical Observatory. Dr. Hawkins is known for his many papers in scientific journals and is the author of STONEHENGE DECODED.

in the Sky

trembles on the brink of a space age with frightening statistics: a sun with internal temperatures of 27,000,000 degrees Fahrenheit, a universe seeded with a billion galaxies, stars so distant that it takes light, moving at a speed of 186,300 miles per second, millions of years to reach us.

What makes Dean Hawkins' book a delight to read, and in its own way a prophecy of his popular Stonehenge Decoded, one of the decade's best mystery yarns, is his ability to slide the reader over harsh conglomerates of fact and statistics with the apparent facility of a space vehicle easing itself into orbit. Splendor in the Sky is addressed neither to the professional astronomer (who naturally knows all it contains) nor to the sensation-hunter, who clamors for entertainment. It is addressed to that branch of our species called "the intelligent layman," an increasingly populous enclave. In short, it is for you and me. It does not write down; it does not fog the reader with jargon. It is written with a vigorous simplicity which manages to say much in few words, and to say it clearly, so that even those resistant to science can understand. It omits what the reader need not know, scrapes away the scientific fat from the bones of essential knowledge. Its hero is man curious, believing, and skeptical. Its plot is ironic: discovery leads to ignorance, for the more we learn the more mysteries we uncover. It is a success story ending in optimistic failure: though science makes "progress," no scientist today identifies himself with the Renaissance Faust, greedy for all knowledge and swollen with the illusion of godhead.

He is a man, and that is all.

Yet despite this story-teller's ease—or perhaps because of it—Dr. Hawkins manages to pepper his chronicle with anecdotes, a few of them familiar, but all of them absorbing and, as our chrysalid youth like to say these days, "relevant." Sir Isaac Newton, who earned national respectability as Master of the Mint, began his early school years, we learn, in what could be called a blaze of failure; years later, at Cambridge, he adopted the unsettling habit of pre-reading all his texts and at times all but pre-empting the authority of his professors. Sodom and Gomorrah were almost certainly destroyed by a meteorite, possibly the same non-saline agency of demolition to overtake Lot's lagging wife. Every hundred years one of these iron projectiles, a meteorite weighing in at four tons, beds down on the earth, often dissolves as it strikes, the most memorable of these impacts having occurred in 1908 in Siberia. "The people within a radius of four hundred miles," calmly comments Dr. Hawkins, "saw and heard a tremendous explosion. Eye-witnesses spoke of a brilliant object moving overhead from the southeast, dropping sparks and leaving behind a trail of smoke. As it hit the ground, the meteorite exploded with the violence of many hydrogen bombs, producing a pillar of fire and smoke . . ." The effects of the holocaust were felt seven hundred miles away.

Dr. Hawkins' book is an informed, literate, and entertaining corrective to the smog-bound parochialism of our overheated civilization, a civilization which sometimes finds New Yorkers muttering their suspicion that milk comes from bottles and that descendants of the country's original settlers lie in ambush behind the guard rails flanking the hillier portions of Interstate 80. Conservationists and ecologists scream with righteous but largely ineffectual indignation that man—most men, at any rate—have lost touch with nature, that they see themselves not as products of evolution but as creatures of technology, existing on pollutants and psychiatry. About that Dean Hawkins also has a few words to say: had man been more enduringly engineered for stress and self-repair, he might have become a much better biological specimen than he is. As a surviving member of the animal kingdom, he nevertheless has to get along as best he can. The coal tar in his lungs and the nitrous oxide in his blood, if nothing else, should persuade him that he belongs to the earth, and had better look down as well as up. Up is the direction Dr. Hawkins has chosen. The effect of Splendor in the Sky is to nudge the reader toward the same aspiring gesture.

Standing as both proof and denial of man's voyage toward knowledge and uncertainty, the book—as well as its one mordant aphorism: "If a mistake is possible, mankind will make it"—is one we are glad to acquire, if only by academic expropriation, as this summer we also acquire the man who wrote it.

College Enriched by Potamkin Art Collection

ART COLLECTIONS depend upon benefactors. Dickinson's art collection and benefactors are in large measure identical.

Meyer P. Potamkin, prominent member of the class of '32, is familiar to many alumni. In 1954 he and his wife, Vivian, returning to the campus for a visit, presented half a hundred or more contemporary lithographs and etchings to the college. These have been used as class illustrations, been exhibited as a collection and some, framed, are decorative additions to administrative office walls, and art for the President's House.

This past spring the Potamkins asked if the College would be interested in a supplemental gift. The answer, an enthusiastic affirmative, resulted in a major addition to the collection, indeed one of handsome proportions. It includes Rouault's Miserere; Chagall's illustrations for Gogol's Les Ames Mortes; signed aquatints, etchings, and lithographs by such notable artists as Picasso, Baskin, Braque, Kollwitz, Dali and others; contemporary sculpture, and art books and periodicals including Verve and Derrier le Miroir. In short, the gift is a munificent one, to be known as "the Meyer P. and Vivian Potamkin Collection."

"Pat" Potamkin, as he is known to his friends, among civic and philanthropic activities, is a member of the Board of Trustees of the Philadelphia Museum of Art serving on the American Art and the Planning and Development Committees. Mrs. Potamkin is a member of the Women's Committee of the Philadelphia Museum of Art, serves as volunteer chairman of the Art Sales and Rental Gallery at the Museum. She is also on the American Art committee. She is a former Board member of the Philadelphia Print Club. Their remarkable private collection is basically American while their collection of sculpture more fundamentally French is not exclusively so since one can also find, for example, a Henry Moore, Giacometti and three carvings by Wilhelm Schimmel, the American Folk Artist. Every major exhibition of an American Painter pre-dating World War II is likely to contain a canvas on loan from the Potamkins. Many others have been reproduced in Life and Time. Their generosity has extended to gifts made to Temple University and the Pennsylvania Academy of Fine Arts and the Philadelphia Museum of Art.

The Miserere of Rouault is perhaps the greatest graphic work of this century. Monumental in achievement the 58 original aquatints and etchings depict the ravages of war and the cruelty of society in juxtaposition to Christ's passion, in part the result of Rouault's religious introspection. In them he lays bare reality to reveal man's fundamental hypocrisy. The rare Chagall volumes with their illustrative original etchings represent that painter's "pictorial folklore" in his best style while the Verve volumes contain Chagall's colored lithographs on the Bible. Of regional interest is a primitive painting by Michael Boyle, a hunting scene with Old West reputedly in the background. Other works by Boyle, a Carlisle plasterer of the 1830's, are at Lafayette College and in the Nelson Rockefeller Collection.

The variety of the gifts presented by Mr. and Mrs. Potamkin make them as useful as they are valuable, as thoughtfully assembled as they are an aesthetic enrichment to the College. Such works as these will further the humanistic aspirations Dickinson seeks for her students.

TOWARD NEW HEIGHTS

"On behalf of the volunteers, on whose shoulders the chief burdens of the Annual Giving Campaign rest, I want to express my appreciation to all whose names appear in this final report for insuring the success of this vital effort. It has been a genuine pleasure to serve as General Chairman and to have the support of the many hundreds of alumni, parents and friends whose interest in higher education enables Dickinson to go forward as one of our nation's outstanding colleges."

Harry C. Zug '34
General Chairman

"We can all be greatly encouraged by the fact that Annual Giving has nearly tripled in amount since the long range objectives of the College were announced in 1964. More significant, however, is the fact that the record showing of the 1969 Dickinson Fund was made possible by those who know the College best."

Samuel W. Witwer '30
Chairman, Board of Trustees

"The organization, hard work and generosity behind this annual drive for the operating funds that enable us to pay our bills for good education confirm the belief that there is very much alive in this land, and especially in Dickinson's constituency, the belief that the private support of independent institutions must continue to be a part of our way of life if that way of life is to include the freedoms we cherish."

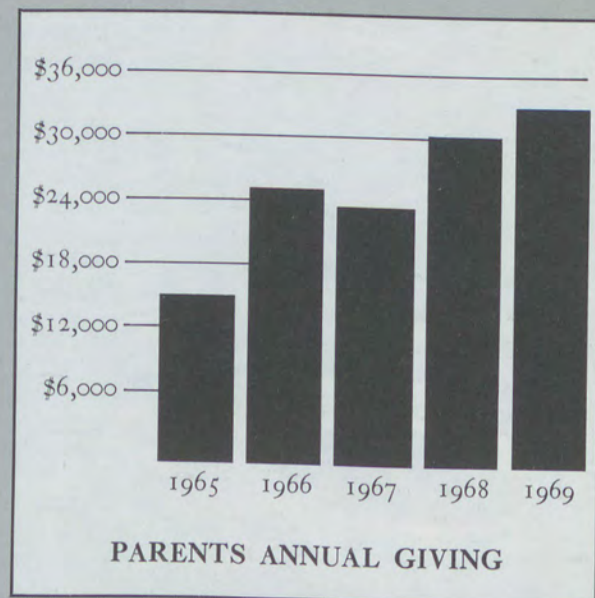

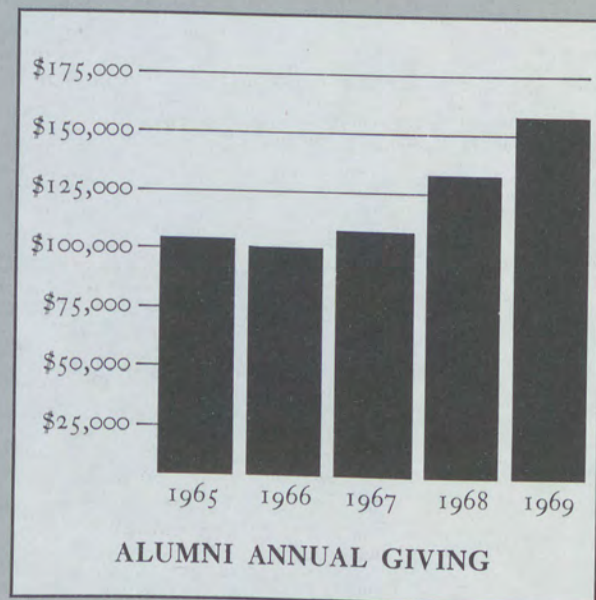

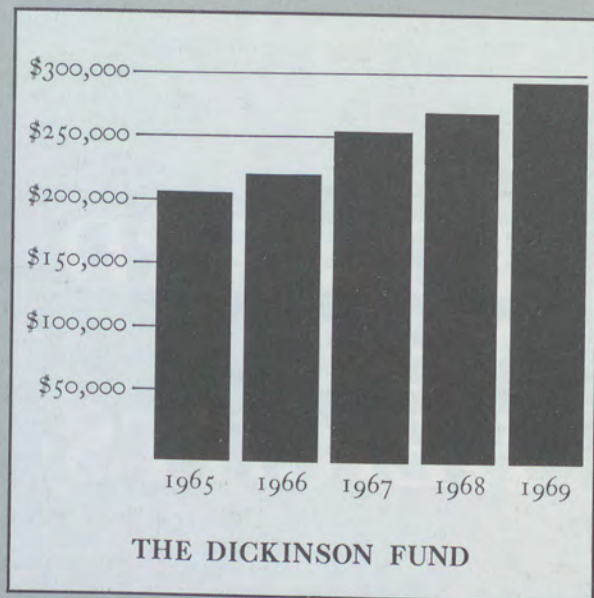

Howard L. Rubendall '31
President

About This Report

Only gifts directly received by the Dickinson Fund and available for current educational programs are reflected in this report. Contributions of gifts to Dickinson's separate capital gifts campaign are reflected in the Bronze Tablet. Special purpose gifts and gifts-in-kind will be recognized in subsequent publications.

During the clerical operations involved in accurately listing the many hundreds of names appearing in this report, it is only too likely that errors occurred. In the event that this is true, please accept our apologies; then advise the Office of Annual Giving at Dickinson College so that the official records may be investigated.

We are deeply grateful that, as a result of your response, a very positive annual report is possible again this year.

Alumni Project Scores

Have you received your Model T? That question must have been asked more often than not, as Charles "Reds" Burn '24 and his Model T Ford Committee shipped out more than 1,600 of the handsome, little red and black models. The offer was clear; the idea was operational; the Committee was generous, as were the alumni.

Alumni were reminded only twice about the unusual project by the Committee whose invitation was simply but sincerely made—"Alumni who contribute $25 or more to the 1969 Dickinson Fund will receive, as our personal gift, a scaled replica of the 1911 Model T Ford pictured. We are doing this as an expression of our gratitude to those fellow alumni who are supporting Dickinson College in recognition of all it has done for them and for us, and as an expression of our realization of the importance of Annual Giving to Dickinson College. The Model T Ford, the most talked about car of the century, will serve as a fitting reminder that our College was judged worthy by the Ford Foundation to participate in its Special Program in Education—the Ford Foundation Challenge."

Results of the Committee's efforts were immediate and encouraging. Over 450 alumni increased their gifts from less than $25 to $25 or more in the 1969 Fund year. Nearly 300 new gifts of $25 or more were received from alumni who had not contributed the previous year. Over a hundred of these latter gifts represented the first gift ever received from the contributing alumnus. And, finally, 210 alumni who contributed in 1968 raised their gifts by $25 or more during the 1969 Fund year.

Unique Vietnam Roles for Two Dickinsonians

Mike Witwer, '63 is Battlefield Stork

While wide-eyed combat marines looked over his shoulder, a young Chicago doctor scored a "first" for the 1st Battalion, 7th Regiment, 1st Marine Division.

Navy Lt. Michael W. Witwer, '63, delivered a baby on Hill 52, in a forward area where shrapnel and Viet Cong sympathies run high.

Both mother, who may be a Viet Cong sympathizer, and new son are doing well, thanks to Mike.

He's the son of Samuel W. Witwer, '30, President of the Board of Trustees.

Mike completed his M.D. work at Northwestern.

He's now a battalion surgeon in the Marine Corps.

"It was the first week of May, during Operation Oklahoma Hill," Dr. Witwer recalled outside his tent on Hill 37 near Da Nang.

"I took a little Medcap down to a village that was pretty much chewed up.

"As usual, there were no fighting men around, just old men and the women of all ages and the babies.

"We got a very cold reception as we entered.

"We set up the Medcap (kind of a clinic for Viet civilians) but we had only 30 patients.

"There had been reports of sniping just up the road so we finished rather rapidly.

"An old man told the interpreter there was a woman in labor back through one of the treelines, in one of the hooches there, and wanted me to come and see her. So I went."

Tim Minnich, '66 in Civic Action Lead

"The struggle in the Republic of Vietnam isn't just a conventional war against the armed invader. There is another phase, the most important struggle. It has many titles but one goal—helping the Vietnamese people to develop the resources they have to make their country progressive and independent. Ours is a four-fold mission," states Captain Tim I. Minnich, '66, Operations Officer for US Army Headquarters Area Command's Civic Actions Office in Saigon. "In our program, we strive for maximum participation by the people, a well coordinated effort, well selected projects and enhancement of the image of the Government of Vietnam."

The USAHAC Civic Actions Office coordinates and conducts assistance projects involving the more than three million people in South Vietnam's capital city. The office receives and investigates hun-

The woman was 45 years old, she was in labor, ready to have her third or fourth child. Nobody around her knew anything about delivering babies.

So Mike took her back to "Hotel 52," a nickname for Hill 52, a Marine firebase where he had a tent.

"I knew we were going to have a baby fairly soon," he said. "So we had to set things up.

"We used a helmet that we washed out and filled with water. We mixed surgical soap with this water and . . . we had a sterile combat surgical kit with a scalpel and surgical scissors.

"So with all the corpsmen gathered around and some marines who were wide-eyed—they'd never thought they would ever see childbirth—we started.

"After some anxious moments, the baby began to come, and it was a storybook thing in a tent out in the middle of the bush," said Witwer.

"The baby came through fine and everybody was just aghast as I held it up around the whole audience. These guys had never seen anything like this before.

"It was a boy. The mother looked very pleased with the whole situation. I had predicted a boy because of all the kicking that was going on.

"I took the baby up and showed the colonel. And the colonel was very pleased and somehow had a little beer on ice that he broke out for all the guys.

"I couldn't have been more proud or pleased about the baby if I had been the father."

Mike has been a battalion surgeon in Vietnam close to eight months now. He was called to duty a year ago after internship at Passavant Hospital.

His wife of 18 months, Leslie, is a daughter of the late Dr. George Bradburn, professor of obstetrics at Northwestern.

Mike says he may go into obstetrics when he gets out of service.

dreds of requests for actions projects.

"We feel that we have a pretty complete and comprehensive program," continues Captain Minnich, "all of our projects are passed through the Saigon mayor's office, and we work closely with the civilian assistance organizations. The projects cover the spectrum from school, orphanage, hospital and church aid to emergency damage repair and food distribution—the list is unlimited. Coordination for examinations and major operations for Vietnamese at the Army's 3d Field Hospital is another important phase of operations.

"All projects are thoroughly checked through local, precinct and district chiefs and reviewed by the Mayor prior to acceptance to insure that the needs are legitimate. Through close coordination with other agencies, duplication of projects is kept to the barest minimum.

"We encourage units to participate in civic actions but ask that they contact us before they begin a project so that we can advise them if we have plans along the same lines. Duplication becomes a giveaway and giveaway has no value."

Captain Minnich expects to return to the States in January.

Where There's A Will, There's A Way

By R. Wallace White, '29, Director, Planned Giving

FOR YEARS the average individual has been subjected to the admonition, "Write a will!" Unfortunately, this valuable and well-meant advice has often been disregarded, perhaps because it is free. The result has been that approximately 50% of those dying leave no will and distribution of their estates is then made under the intestate laws, which are quite inflexible. They leave no room for preferential treatment of one member of a class over another member of the same class, regardless of how close a personal relationship may have existed between that person and the decedent. Provisions of intestate laws are so impersonal that their application may result in distribution of part or all of an estate to an individual whose very existence was unknown to the decedent at the time of his death.

On the other hand, the individual who heeds the advice of those advocating the preparation of a will has both freedom and flexibility in the disposition of his estate. Chief among the options and advantages available to one giving by will are:

1. The direction of property distribution and the naming of those to share in the estate.
2. The designation of an executor.
3. The appointment of guardians.
4. The ability to provide income for life or for a period of years to one person with ultimate disposition of the assets to another person.
5. The opportunity to make proper plans for minimum tax impact upon the estate.

To summarize, a will is a means by which a reasonable man may make disposition of his estate in such a manner as to satisfy his own desires as to how best to care for the objects of his bounty.

HOW MAY gifts be made by will? There are several ways. The most obvious is an out-right bequest. The gift may be of a specific sum or of a specific property. It may be a gift without any limitation as to use, or as is often the case with charitable bequests, a gift for a certain specific use or purpose, or for the accomplishment of a specific objective. Another mode of giving, often used in the case of real estate, is to give to one person the use of property for life with remainder to another person or to an institution upon the death of the life tenant. A widely used method of giving is by the establishment of a trust with income to a certain person or persons for life or for a term of years and upon the termination of such period to an ultimate beneficiary, absolutely. This is often used for the making of charitable gifts. In such a case, the value of the remainder interest is ascertainable, and if given to a qualified charity, is deductible from the gross estate as a charitable contribution.

The gift of the remainder to the charity may be completely unrestricted or there may be a stipulation that the remainder may be used only for a specified purpose, such as the construction of a building. It may also be provided that the remainder be kept intact and only the income be used, again either for general or special purpose, as directed.

The making of charitable gifts by will has become increasingly popular. In recent years, Dickinson College has received some of its largest gifts as a result of testamentary bequests.

One final thought. Drafting a will is no do-it-yourself project. Your attorney should advise you as to how best to carry out your wishes, how to minimize applicable taxes and whether or not the use of a trust is desirable. He can also assist you in the proper planning for charitable gifts.

IT'S BEEN A GREAT FIVE YEARS!

Thank you for the privilege of serving you as Alumni Secretary these past five years. I consider the experience to have been the most meaningful of my professional life.

I leave Dickinson now for Danville, Pa., where it seems I might be helpful to the Geisinger Medical Center as its Director of Development.

President Rubendall's recent Message from the President compliments the effectiveness of our work as he thanks the Dickinson constituency for responding to the College in its period of extraordinary need. It is good to know that these offices played a significant role in the renewal of this fine old school.

Back in 1964 when the Alumni Council and the President of the College named me to the job, some of the goals of the College seemed frightfully distant. Yet, here we are, five years later, with the Ford Challenge met and another Annual Giving Campaign surpassing its ambitious mark.

The reason for this success is that there has been a splendid team at work. We've a first-rate combination in the offices of Communications and Development. Key members of the Dickinson family have brought their considerable strengths and relationships to the ongoing program. And our faculty is superb. And our student body is as endowed and is as all-American as you would find anywhere! So we had something worthwhile to sell and Alumni bought.

Albeit however immodest of me, I must suggest that the offices of Director of Alumni Affairs, Director of Public Relations, and Director of Placement are in good order as I depart.

It is sadly true that there are those in our constituency, as in any, who display no constructive interest. But as a tribute to the many whose loyalties are deep, I would close with the overworked phrase, which you heard at every alumni club meeting:

Thank you for coming out for this special Dickinson occasion. You are people who care for Dickinson and the College moves ahead on the strength of those who care.

With all good wishes, and hopes that you will continue to care,
