Commencement 1971

“In an amazing show of solidarity and deep admiration and respect, the Dickinson community turned the 198th Commencement into a succession of tributes to the tall and vigorous man who has given the school ‘a solid decade of service’.”

If President Howard L. Rubendall had any real differences with his Dickinson College students, faculty or trustees over the past 10 years—and he had few—they were not evident on Commencement Weekend.

In an amazing show of solidarity and deep admiration and respect, the Dickinson community turned the 198th Commencement into a succession of tributes to the tall and vigorous man who has given the school “a solid decade of service.”

The students, in an unscheduled tribute read at the Commencement exercises, said Dr. Rubendall was “the single most important factor in the life of Dickinson College over the past 10 years” and by way of emphasizing this point, announced creation of a permanent scholarship fund in his name.

The faculty, in an eloquent testimonial read by its secretary, Dr. Howard C. Long, saluted the Rubendall decade as “one of the most significant of their lives.”

The trustees saw Dr. Rubendall’s leadership as the kind that “has moved Dickinson ahead.”

And alumni, through a resolution presented by Walter E. Beach ’56 and adopted unanimously by the Alumni Council, called the 10 years a period of “sustained and healthy growth and improvement of the College.”

The accolades brought a catch to the presidential voice on Commencement Day and the audience strained to hear his response. A college, said Dr. Rubendall, has always reminded him of a classic cathedral—a work of many hands, a work of many generations, and a work that is never done. “So,” he said, “let’s continue to work for the beloved College.”

Two other persons came in for tributes, which like those to President Rubendall, elicited prolonged applause and brought the huge audience to its feet.

Dr. Harry F. Booth, chairman of the Department of Religion and a Dickinson teacher since 1964, received the Gano Award as the seniors’ most inspiring teacher. The award, which is $1000 and other emoluments, is given to the professor who by secret ballot of members of the graduating seniors immediately prior to graduation is voted the most inspirational teacher during their college years.

Dr. Horace E. Rogers ’24, senior member of the faculty, who is retiring after 43 years of teaching and a 50 year association with his alma mater was on the program to assist at the conferring of the honorary Doctor of Science degree upon one of his former students, Dr. Jesse J. Hymes ’33, now a prominent New York surgeon.

After receiving his degree, Dr. Hymes tarried at the podium and placed a restraining hand on Dr. Rogers’ arm. He began a tribute to the veteran professor.

Secretly alumni, colleagues and friends of Dr. Rogers have been contributing to a new scholarship in his name, said Dr. Hymes. The scholarship is for a student majoring in the physical sciences with preference to be given young men and women majoring in chemistry. The principle sum is now large enough to provide a grant of no less than $600 next term.

"This is a testimony to the respect and admiration this man has kindled over the years," said Dr. Hymes.

Others receiving honorary degrees were Thomas W. Richards '50, president of the Nature Conservancy, Doctor of Humane Letters; Dr. William A. Arrowsmith, classicist and writer on the M.I.T. faculty, Doctor of Laws; and Chaplain Richard Unsworth of Smith College, baccalaureate preacher, Doctor of Sacred Theology.

The Commencement Speaker, former U. S. Commissioner of Education, Harold Howe, II, now a Ford Foundation vice-president, called upon the graduates to take part in the age-old fight against hunger, ignorance and disease which constitute, he warned, a threat to the world's security and peace.

"We have on the one hand the minority of affluent, western-oriented, white people, and on the other the majority of eastern and tropical non-white and poverty stricken," he said. ". . . the continuance of most of mankind in a condition of degradation is going to tear the world apart."

He told the graduating class that if they can avoid the beguiling idea that there is some panacea, one dragon to kill and then all will be peace and happiness, they probably have a chance to do more for this troubled world than any generation in man's history.

The Hufstader Prizes of $200 each, to the senior man and woman who did the most for the College over the four years, were presented by Dr. Rubendall to Joseph A. Layman, Jr., Medford Lakes, N. Y., and Gertrude Dorsey Green, Summerville, S. C.

Seven members of the class were graduated summa cum laude—Deborah Buckles, Wycoff, New Jersey; Kathleen Callanan, Silver Spring, Maryland; Kenneth Corson, Trenton, New Jersey; Barbara Dixon, Weston, Connecticut; Theodore Hetrick, Jr., Beavertown, Pennsylvania; Martha Lee Purvis, Havertown, Pennsylvania, who was the top-ranking senior, and Ronald Waetzman, Philadelphia.

Representatives of Wheel and Chain and Omicron Delta Kappa read the student body's tribute to President Rubendall, which was primarily an expression of gratitude for his deep interest in the students.

"As a result of his support," the statement read, "students have become actively involved in dormitory regulations, institutional planning, departmental affairs, public relations and in the evaluation of faculty. Each new step has been a challenge to students to fulfill the confidence and trust Dr. Rubendall placed in them . . . Because of his empathy for the concerns of students, moments of crisis and confrontation that might have resulted in violence or destruction have been calmed and redirected to careful self-examination.

"Through his efforts, students have been given a role in the life of the college—a say in its affairs. In turn, they have also been given the chance to contribute to and serve the College while they were yet students.

Omicron Delta Kappa and Wheel and Chain took the initiative in gathering the funds for the Rubendall Scholarship.

The trustees' tribute was voiced by Samuel W. Witwer '30, president of the board. He characterized Dr. Rubendall's administration as "able, dedicated, wise . . . under his leadership Dickinson has been strengthened in every way and put itself in a place to move ahead in new directions."

Witwer announced that the trustees voted Dr. Rubendall a leave of absence for such part of the coming academic year as he felt he may wisely spend away from the campus for "travel and relaxation."

Commencement Weekend activities began Thursday evening, May 20, with a formal dinner for trustees, faculty and administration.

Immediately thereafter, those present moved to the Bernard Center for the Humanities (formerly East College), for the dedication of the lobby in the memory of Charles Keller Zug, a graduate of the Class of 1880 and a trustee of the College from 1902 to 1929. The lobby's donor is Trustee Harry C. Zug '34 and he and other members of the Zug family were on hand for the occasion. Board President Witwer, President Rubendall and historian of the College, Charles C. Sellers, participated in the ceremony.

The Board of Trustees met throughout the day on Friday and the biannual alumni council dinner was held Friday night with trustees, alumni council members, annual giving volunteers, alumni club presidents, reunion chairmen and students in attendance. Following the dinner, those present had the opportunity to meet with students in small discussion groups.

In addition to Saturday's normal Alumni Day and reunion activities, Board President Witwer dedicated the $2.2 million Anita Tuvin Schlechter Auditorium with the principal donor, Louis A. Tuvin '10 and members of his family participating in the ceremonies.

Following the dedication at the entrance of the auditorium, members of the audience moved inside, going to any one of the auditorium's three sections for brief concurrent programs. A string quartet played in one section, a film was shown in another and the Dickinson Mime Troupe performed in the third. Then, as the audience watched, the giant electrically driven acoustical walls that form the sections were rolled back to expose the arena-type auditorium at its maximum size. Additional performances then took place in sight of the entire audience. □

HALL OF FAME STATUS FOR THREE ALUMNI ATHLETES

Mrs. Forrest E. Craver, Francis C. Bayley '26 and Fred E. Sweely '28 with their Sports Hall of Fame Plaques.

At the Alumni Day Luncheon on Saturday, May 22, three more Dickinson athletic greats were inducted into the Sports Hall of Fame.

The inductees received a handsome scrolled plaque and a gold-plated lifetime pass to Dickinson athletic events. Their names will be permanently inscribed on the Hall of Fame Plaque in the lobby of the Alumni Gymnasium, where only the names of Francis A. Dunn '14, Hyman Goldstein '15 and Samuel Padjen '39 presently appear.

One of the inductees is the late Forrest E. Craver '99, who was involved in Dickinson athletics for half a century and was honored posthumously. The others are: Francis C. Bayley '26, outstanding distance runner of his era who still holds the school record for the two mile run; and Fred E. Sweely '28, who was the first man to captain teams in three varsity sports at the College.

Prior to the individual presentations, President Rubendall made the following comments concerning the Sports Hall of Fame: "Fellow alumni and friends, today we have reached another milestone in the long history of our fine College. As most of you know, we inaugurated the Dickinson College Sports Hall of Fame in 1969. On November 8th of that year we inducted the first three members into that elite group. All three were outstanding football players at Dickinson and so we honored them at our Homecoming game during the centennial year of college football. It truly was a memorable occasion.

"Because of the impact of the memory of that occasion, Dickinson has decided to make the Sports Hall of Fame ceremony a permanent part of alumni activities. We wanted as many alumni present as possible to share the memory of the Sports Hall of Fame, since it is from the ranks of alumni that these outstanding men are chosen.

"The reasons behind the Dickinson College Sports Hall of Fame are exquisitely simple. We want to pay tribute to that real man—the one who distinguished himself as an athlete at Dickinson and then continued to characterize the lessons of sportsmanship he learned here in his public and private life. In short, what we are saying is, 'Here is a man who did a great job for us as an athlete and then did the job for society as a fine citizen!' What greater compliment can we pay to an alumnus, or to our fellow man?"

In honoring "Pop" Craver, the President said: ". . . To Forrest E. Craver, who came to Dickinson and starred as an end on the football team and for many years held the school's pole vault record in track. But that is only a small part of his contribution. He ultimately devoted a half-century to Dickinson—a teacher of Latin, Greek and mathematics—a fine football and track coach who pioneered the movement for campus-wide participation in sports."

Craver's widow accepted the award, along with his son, Forrest E. Craver, Jr., his daughter, Mrs. Margaret Craver Grimm '29 and his grandson, Roger M. Craver '63.

The presentation to Bayley read as follows: ". . . To Francis C. Bayley, outstanding distance runner whose school record for the two mile run still stands. After graduation he won second place in the two mile championship at Madison Square Garden, finished second in the national indoor steeplechase and was third in the national indoor two mile championship. Now retired, he became renowned as Dean of Men at Denison University."

The President referred to Sweely as "the first man ever to captain three varsity sports at Dickinson College." He went on to say: "He, too, is a current holder of a College record—a 98-yard runback with an intercepted forward pass. He scored two other touchdowns that day in 1925 against P.M.C. He also was one of Dickinson's fine shooting forwards in basketball and for a long time held the College's high jump record in track.

"As we reflect on the glories of these men, it is my fervent wish that they will serve as bright remembrances to all of us of our past, and as examples for Dickinson College athletes of the present and of the future."

Black Studies at Dickinson

Establishment of black studies courses at a small, predominately white liberal arts college can be a task differing markedly from the creation of other new programs at such a school.

Sometimes frustrating, sometimes blessed with signs of progress, the effort is being made at Dickinson. There are presently 63 blacks in the student body.

Until the summer of 1969 course content emphasizing black culture, history and achievements was an incidental thing. To some extent it still is. However, two years ago in a memorandum announcing a student-faculty-administration seminar on black studies, the Dean's office stated: "It is obvious that we all need to be fully aware of both the contributions of minority groups to our own disciplines and especially the nature of black consciousness in contemporary American society."

The workshop continued through four days. Upon conclusion it was felt Dickinson could best implement black studies, not by creation of a special program or department, but rather by giving "new emphasis" to existing courses and formulating new course structures where necessary "to assist students in understanding the problems of men and nations from perspectives other than their own and their culture's."

This informal report, though it cannot be considered an official statement of the College's position on black studies (there is none), has served as a guide for various departments considering changes or additions in course material.

"To rush into the field either with ill prepared teachers or with a poorly prepared program would not be educationally sound or helpful to education in black studies," said College Chaplain Paul Kaylor, a seminar participant, explaining why creation of a separate department was not thought workable.

"The report also took into account the availability of black scholars to a school the size of Dickinson," he added, thus touching on an issue which may be quite difficult to resolve at the present time.

Criticism of existing black studies areas has brought up just that point: the need for black educators. At present there is but one, and she is employed part-time, commuting weekly from Baltimore. Her name is Madeline W. Murphy. Quite outspoken, Mrs. Murphy, whose son attends Dickinson, is an active civil rights worker. She teaches "Perspectives in Race," an offering by the Sociology Department.

"The ultimate goal of black studies, as I see it, is that the curricula in all areas of learning—art, science, sociology, medicine, history, etc., will truthfully reflect the inextricable weaving of black peoples' contributions to civilization, not as a separate unit but as part of the whole," Mrs. Murphy says. "If the administration sincerely wants more black students, active recruitment of black professors will be just one part of the solution."

And therein lies the rub.

"We have had difficulty recruiting black instructors," comments Richard H. Wanner, Dean of the College. "There are several reasons why. Two years ago we encountered a kind of backlash from black colleges unhappy over the stealing away of their instructors by prestigious schools. In recent years we haven't had the applications and other institutions seem to have had greater success in attracting them, more alluring salaries being just one of a number of reasons.

Dean Richard H. Wanner

Professor C. Flint Kellogg

"As far as we're concerned we would be very happy to have black instructors," Dean Wanner added.

In 1953, when the term "black studies" was yet to be coined, Dickinson was offering a course called The Negro American, covering "The historical and present problem of the American Negro and the cause and effects of prejudice and discrimination," according to the college catalogue. When the instructor retired 10 years later, it was dropped.

Another long-running course was Culture and Race Relations, "the concept of race variations in culture, race prejudice and processes of social interaction." It was listed initially in the 1956 catalogue and continued through 1964. There were four other offerings in this study area during the last 20 years, all for relatively brief periods.

Today the curriculum contains nearly as many courses dealing directly with black society as it has in the past two decades. In addition to "Perspectives on Race," which first appeared six years ago, they are: Black Politics in the American Political System, The Negro in America and a seminar on 20th Century Negro Leadership. There are no immediate plans to increase the number of courses in the near future. "Certainly we will continue with present classes," said Dean Wanner, adding that "our current fiscal situation" would determine future expansion.

Prof. Flint Kellogg, who conducts the seminar mentioned above, is marking his 25th year at Dickinson. His writings include a section in the Encyclopedia of Black America entitled "The NAACP" and Volume I of A History of the National Association for The Advancement of Colored People. Additionally, he has edited two books: The Status of the Negro in New York and The Walls Came Tumbling Down, an autobiography of Mary White Ovington, NAACP founder. Prof. Kellogg has been called "an authority on civil rights and race relations."

"Negro students have particular problems that their white counterparts don't experience," he said recently. "They want a black instructor and adviser who can help them find employment, for example, or enter graduate school. Most of our faculty come from a comfortable background and are unfamiliar with problems of blacks."

Prof. Kellogg, who has also taught The Negro in America, a lecture course, recalls, "Maybe it's because we're white, but we found difficulty with Negro students. The whole business of slavery is embarrassing to them. In the seminar there is, I think, a little tension between white and black students. It's like teaching Christianity to Jews—you're going to have emotional problems. I suppose the obvious one is, 'what does a white man know about this, never having lived it?'. It is also very difficult to make white students realize under what conditions many blacks live. Most of them have never been to a slum, white or black."

Prof. Kellogg, who has suggested establishment of a chair of Black Studies at Dickinson to be filled by a Negro instructor, sees the desirability of increased discussion among the various departments to avoid duplication in black studies courses while also providing a means for development of a "coherent, overall plan"—needs voiced by many others, students and instructors alike.

Kenneth Woodard is 21, black and a Dickinson senior. From Newark, N. J., a city in some turmoil, he speaks as one familiar with the college's current black studies efforts, its good points as well as shortcomings.

He too cited the need for black professors while also realizing that "the College has been unable to attract them," adding, "possibly because of a lack of commitment. . ."

Black students are asking the College to hire a black studies consultant to help co-ordinate present studies and determine how black and African material can be integrated into on-going course work, Woodard said. "While Dickinson clearly can not be a black studies college . . . one of the things that upsets us is that it has many resources not being used," he continued, citing the "expertise" of a certain professor in "19th century African history" who can't teach it because there is "no course for him." Also, "journals on top of journals dealing with African history, psychology, etc. in the library are just rotting on the shelves at this point."

"We propose a greater integration of black studies in the general curriculum," Woodard said. "For example, a black student taking French, instead of translating the usual assignments, should be able to translate works of black authors."

"The same could be done in the study of German. Many Frenchmen and Germans took African art and culture back with them during exploitation of Africa. Some of the best interpretations of African culture are in those languages."

When questioned on the one most necessary improvement in black studies, Woodard unhesitatingly replied: "The primary problem is . . . lack of depth. We need more black studies courses in order to cover a greater amount of material. Even two semesters of black history aren't adequate. We need more courses and more time to gain sufficient background."

He saw this inability to engage in extensive study as a hinderance to both races. "Unfortunately the white student has not been exposed to enough black history, literature, etc. and thus feels intellectually inadequate in talking with blacks and this puts a damper on full class discussion."

"It's amazing that teachers have been able to cover Negro history in one semester. I think that's to their credit. But at the same time it should be possible to focus on one area and discuss issues more fully."

Dickinson junior Miriam G. Lovett, a white student who has taken two of the school's four black studies offerings, agrees with Woodard's contention that whites lack a sufficient background in black studies. "Classes get very tense sometimes," she says. "White students don't have the background that blacks have acquired often on their own. There's also the basic feeling both have that whites are white and blacks are black" and differences will always exist.

She was asked about "the most constructive" lesson gained from her black studies classes. "It's that I don't know anything of black life," she replied, "and that I've started reading. And not Martin Luther King, etc., but an entirely different group of people such as Marcus Garvey and Elijah Muhammed. The press has mis-interpreted for me what many black authors have said. I don't get the same impression from reading them I had before. As Americans we have been taught we give the society something and it gives us something. But when you get the accounts from black kids, you suddenly realize they have a right to their anger against the system. This is a difficult thing for the white student to understand."

The 1969 workshop stated the purpose of its report was "to articulate the judgment of the group concerning the next steps to be taken in institutional policy, program development and curricular change in order to meet the challenge of education in a world no longer defined intellectually and politically by European standards."

Here is how current offerings have followed through on those recommendations:

Sociology: "Perspectives on Race," 64 students, approximately one third black. Mrs. Murphy says she has explored "all symptoms of the disease of racism so that black as well as white students, once having detected the symptoms, will then be able to deal with attempts at a cure." "I feel," she continued, "that the first prerequisite in dealing with a problem of such magnitude is to know the background, the culture, the source of power of black people, in order to understand the strength, and the sheer dogged determination which has undergirded our fight for civil rights. For white students, who have come from sheltered communities where individual institutional racism is de rigueur, this course may broaden their insight and concept of the dangers they too face as victims of the disease . . . then they can perhaps become the change agents and catalysts through which a better society emerges."

Political Science: "Black Politics in the American Political System," 18 students, 9 black, 9 white. Prof. Russell A. Dondero stated the course was "an attempt to study every aspect of black political experiences today. It is an attempt to introduce in students a sense of what can be done to solve their problems, and an understanding among those of us who are not members of a minority race of these attempted solutions."

History: "The Negro in America," 31 students, 5 black, 26 white. Prof. Charles A. Jarvis says an important aspect of his teachings is "to show the moral dilemma of being black in America." "I attempt to tear down a white wall of prejudice," he adds, "and I don't envision my purpose as building up a black wall. I want to expose some of the fears, prejudices and ignorances that have created a rather intolerable social situation today. I try to defeat the myth that society is burdened with: that the African is a savage, therefore inferior and inslavable. The African had a past that he can justifiably be proud of. It is distributed in many areas of art, learning and government. This we attempt to illustrate." Prof. Jarvis also noted that Negro history "is not new history," has been taught at black colleges for many years and that "only recently has it crept into the curriculum of white schools."

History: "Seminar in 20th century Negro Leadership," 14 students, 8 blacks, 6 white. Prof. Kellogg said seminar objectives were "to cover the thought of 20th century Negro leaders, their objectives, what they consider their roles and what others consider them." □

The Unsung Heroes of Dickinson Athletics

Ross Gingrich, Steve Aldinger, Rob Evans, Bruce Davis and Bob Garber often show up long before practice or a game and are still there afterwards. They are neither athletes nor cheerleaders, though they might be a combination of both.

They are Dickinson's student athletic trainers.

They cheer victories and mourn defeats. They labor in the shadows of their classmates whose names and accomplishments are recorded on the sports pages. And, although their presence seldom is impressive, they would be sorely missed if they weren't around.

"I think they're as concerned about the physical well-being of the athlete as I am," said Bruce Vogelsong, Dickinson's head athletic trainer, recognized as one of the top men in his field. "Without these people, I couldn't do the job the College expects to be done for the athletes."

The athletes think so, too. Says Bob Crobak, Media, Pa., a first-stringer in football, wrestling and baseball: "I think they do a really good job. Bruce teaches them well and they are adept. I trust them as much as I trust Bruce."

According to Dick Barnoski, basketball player from Middletown, Pa.: "They're very competent. They seem to be able to handle anything that's brought to them."

Testimonials? Sure. But appreciation is their chief reward. "I like to give them credit when they do a good job. So do the athletes," Vogelsong said. "The real joy is when an athlete thanks them for what they have done."

Except for taping knees and giving diathermy treatments, student trainers do all the things Vogelsong does. They tape ankles (which is done thousands of times every year at Dickinson), treat cuts and blisters, administer ice, heat and whirlpool treatments. They also keep the training room clean and enforce training room rules.

Vogelsong likes to take them under his wing as freshmen and keep them throughout their undergraduate days.

Gingrich, Grand Island, N. Y. and formerly of Millville, Pa., is one of them. Now a senior, he has been in the program since his freshman year.

Although a student manager at Millville High, he admitted he had a long way to go to become a student trainer at Dickinson. "Almost everything I know I learned here. I've worked with every team here at one time or another."

Gingrich had to sacrifice other interests, like the Mermaid Players on campus, to be a student trainer. But he has no regrets. "The associations I've made, the people I've met both on and off the campus by traveling with our teams, have been tremendous," he said.

A math major and Dean's List student, Gingrich plans to attend graduate school and go into college teaching.

Evans also made the Dean's List. Formerly of Harrisburg, he is a sophomore from Levittown, Pa. He had two years as a high school trainer and admits that "it was never anything like this."

At Dickinson, he said, he learned athletic training "is a lot more important to the overall athletic program. I never realized how a bad trainer could hurt a program and how a good trainer can help it." This was a lesson from Vogelsong whom he classified as "the best" as a teacher.

Evans isn't sure whether he'll return to athletic training after this semester. Next year he will attend Dickinson's Center for International Studies at Bologna, Italy and he can't predict anything beyond that.

Aldinger, a product of South Williamsport High School, enjoys the "varied interests" he experiences. "I was interested in sports and this was the best way I had to stay in contact with them here." He considers the "good relationship" with the athletes "a must" for him to function effectively and wants to stay in training the rest of his time at Dickinson.

Davis and Garber are freshmen being instructed in a field they say demands "more skill" and involves much more equipment than they were accustomed to as high school trainers. Davis, from N. Allegheny High in Pittsburgh, is pleased, though. "I couldn't have picked a better job. I'm here to get all I can out of college and this already has added to my education."

Garber, who put in two years at Butler, Pa., High School, with football, basketball and gymnastics likes the degree of competence required of him, plus the fact that "in college the athletes treat you like a friend."

Garber's brother, Larry, was so proficient as a trainer he received a full four-year scholarship at Kent State for that purpose. He will graduate this spring after having achieved a physical therapist status.

Vogelsong said five student trainers are necessary at Dickinson to facilitate the taping and treatments through three sports seasons—fall, winter and spring. "Except for the non-contact sports, golf, cross country and tennis, we cover all our teams away as well as home."

Dedication is the first lesson for each student trainer. "I try to teach them this," said Vogelsong, "because even if they did this kind of work in high school chances are we do it differently."

The first year is an introductory one. "If they can tear tape I can teach them everything else," the head trainer explained.

Student trainers at Dickinson usually are "lads who like sports but cannot compete as athletes," Vogelsong said. Most are paid through federal work-study funds or by the athletic department.

"If they're interested and willing to spend the time, we can make pretty good trainers out of them by the time they are juniors," said Vogelsong.

Surprisingly, in nine years at Dickinson, a school with a strong pre-med program, he has had only one trainer head toward the medical profession. He's Jay Kempf '66, Cherry Hill, N. J., now a fighter pilot in Viet Nam. Jay plans a career in aerospace medicine.

We've Come A Long Way, Baby!

"Dickinson College is a community. A decision affecting some members affects, to varying degrees, all members."

According to W. Max Wise, a professor at Columbia University, writing in the American Association for Higher Education's publication, The Troubled Campus: "The changes that have been made in college government take a variety of forms in different colleges and universities . . . Moreover, variations are due also to the particularities within the institutions which prompted the changes; thus, at Columbia, the changes were made in response to the occupation of buildings in 1968 while, at other institutions, changes were made without the stimulus of such dramatic events."

Professor Wise goes on to say that modifications in collegiate government seem to incorporate the following: "first, they provide the structural means for the expression of opinion, and often the right to vote, to representatives of groups which have hitherto been under-represented or not represented at all . . .; second, most changes in collegiate government are intended to make the processes of decision-making more explicit and the decision-making bodies more visible to the campus."

Fortunately, Dickinson is one of the "other institutions" mentioned in the first paragraph above. Changes in governance at the College have been evolving in a steady, positive manner over almost a decade—"without the stimulus of such dramatic events."

For years, Dickinson's administration and faculty made and enforced those decisions appropriate to their responsibilities as outlined in the College's By-Laws. As a result, a large segment of the College community, as Professor Wise goes on to point out—namely the student body—was "under-represented or not represented at all" in the decision-making processes of the College, even though that group was indeed—possibly more than any other single group—affected by the same decisions.

If indeed justification for changes in college governance is necessary, Professor Wise states it this way: "A more direct and more helpful way to justify the changes is to note that they are intended to make the governmental procedures more consistent with the actual distribution of power and authority . . . For example, there can be little doubt that the power and authority (of some) has been in decline for some time (. . . at least since the end of World War II). The perpetuation of systems of government which were reflections of the distribution of power and authority of a past era made them dysfunctional and in many institutions exercises in futility. This inconsistency between the arrangements for government and the shift in power and authority accounts for the principal characteristic of collegiate government during the past two decades: it was essentially immobilized because the power to veto (by refusing to accept decisions) outweighed the power to decide. Since the power (of some) had risen but had not yet been reflected in changes in governmental processes, they were left with little alternative . . . To the extent, therefore, that the modifications in collegiate government more accurately reflect the actual conditions of power and authority on the campus, they seem to me to be useful."

The first step in what has been something of a concentrated effort to involve students in decision-making at Dickinson came in 1963, with the formation of the Women's Interdormitory Council. This student group was given the responsibility of developing and enforcing regulations in women's residence halls.

In 1965, honor houses were established for senior women, with those living in the houses once again establishing and enforcing their own rules. The next year, the honor system was established in some fraternities and the concept was expanded to all residence halls for men in 1967.

At the same time, many faculty committees were inviting student representatives to join in their deliberations, with voice. The student right to vote at such committee meetings came in 1968.

The year 1969 saw three major steps in the enfranchising of students into the deliberative stages of decision-making on the campus. First, the Faculty passed legislation giving self-regulation to residence halls. Second, students who were sitting on Faculty Committees were invited to attend Faculty Meetings with voice, but without vote. Third, a comprehensive review of the judicial system of the College was completed and a "Statement of Student Rights and Freedoms" was established. The following, taken from the Preamble of this statement, should properly exemplify its nature:

"Dickinson College exists for the pursuit of truth, the transmission of knowledge, the development of students, and the well-being of society. Free inquiry and free expression by all members of the academic community are indispensable to the attainment of these goals. Students, in particular, should be encouraged to develop the capacity for critical judgement and to engage in a sustained and independent search for truth. Academic freedom must, therefore, include both the freedom to teach and the freedom to learn. Both faculty and students should exercise these freedoms with responsibility. The freedom to learn depends upon appropriate opportunities and conditions in the classroom, on the campus, and in the larger community. The responsibility to secure and to respect general conditions conducive to this freedom is shared by all members of the academic community."

The next, and at this point the last, step taken in the process of which we have been speaking, was taken in the Spring of 1970, when the committee structure of the College was extensively reorganized to create a single major system of College Committees, composed of students, faculty and administration. The formation of the committees was the result of the efforts of a special Governance Subcommittee, once again composed of students, faculty and administration. The following general considerations formed the basis upon which the committee completed its work:

1. Dickinson College is a community. A decision affecting some members affects, to varying degrees, all members.
2. Those affected by decisions should have a say in formulating and implementing them. It is important that diverse perspectives be adequately represented in the various decision-making bodies. But adequacy does not necessarily imply parity.
3. Those with competence in particular areas should have a say in formulating and implementing decisions relating to those areas. The members of the college community have differing needs, differing talents, differing responsibilities. These differences should be respected and used for the common good. The members of the community are interdependent, but their roles are not interchangeable.

4. Government in the college community should be representative. For the process of decision-making to be effective, some must act in behalf of all. But those who make decisions should be responsive to the interests of the rest through procedures of accountability and distributed responsibility.

In light of the above, the Faculty voted to dissolve some existing Faculty committees and to establish the following "All-College" Committees—whose members include faculty, students and administrators: College Committee on Institutional Priorities and Resources; College Committee on Personnel; College Committee on Academic Program; College Committee on Academic Standards; College Committee on Student Affairs; College Committee on Admissions and Financial Aid; College Committee on Development and Communications. The President and the Dean of the College are ex officio members of all.

This system of College committee structure has now existed for a full academic year. It seems to be working—well and, it might be added, hard.

It is of course impossible for us to summarize the results of the work of all of these committees. The approval by the Faculty of a limited extension of the coeducational housing experiment (as reported in the April 1971 issue of the Dickinson Alumnus), upon recommendation of the College Committee on Student Affairs, might be one example. The approval by the Faculty of changes in academic programs and distribution requirements, as recommended by the College Committee on Academic Program might be another.

But one example seems to stick out above all others. As was reported in our last issue, the Budget Subcommittee of the College Committee on Institutional Priorities and Resources was, earlier this year, facing an anticipated College deficit for the 1971-72 academic year of $380,000. This was initially shaved considerably. Yet, through further "belt-tightening" efforts suggested by the Subcommittee, accepted by the parent committee and the President of the College, a balanced budget for the year in question was presented to and approved by the Board of Trustees at their Commencement Weekend Meeting.

Quoting President Rubendall, as reported by The Dickinsonian; "Happily, in meeting the need to examine our program and maintain quality, the College through its new governance structure has an excellent device with which to work. The Budget Subcommittee of IPR (College Committee on Institutional Priorities and Resources) is to be commended for its approach to the problem of 'belt tightening'."

Imagine! A balanced budget, whose preparation is the result of the efforts of students as well as administrators, faculty and trustees. □
