New Alumni Directory to be Published

The first Directory of Living Alumni of Dickinson College since 1964 is currently in preparation. Long in demand, the new directory will be published by the Bernard C. Harris Publishing Company of White Plains, New York. The Harris Company specializes in this type of project and has published directories for fine colleges and universities too numerous to mention.

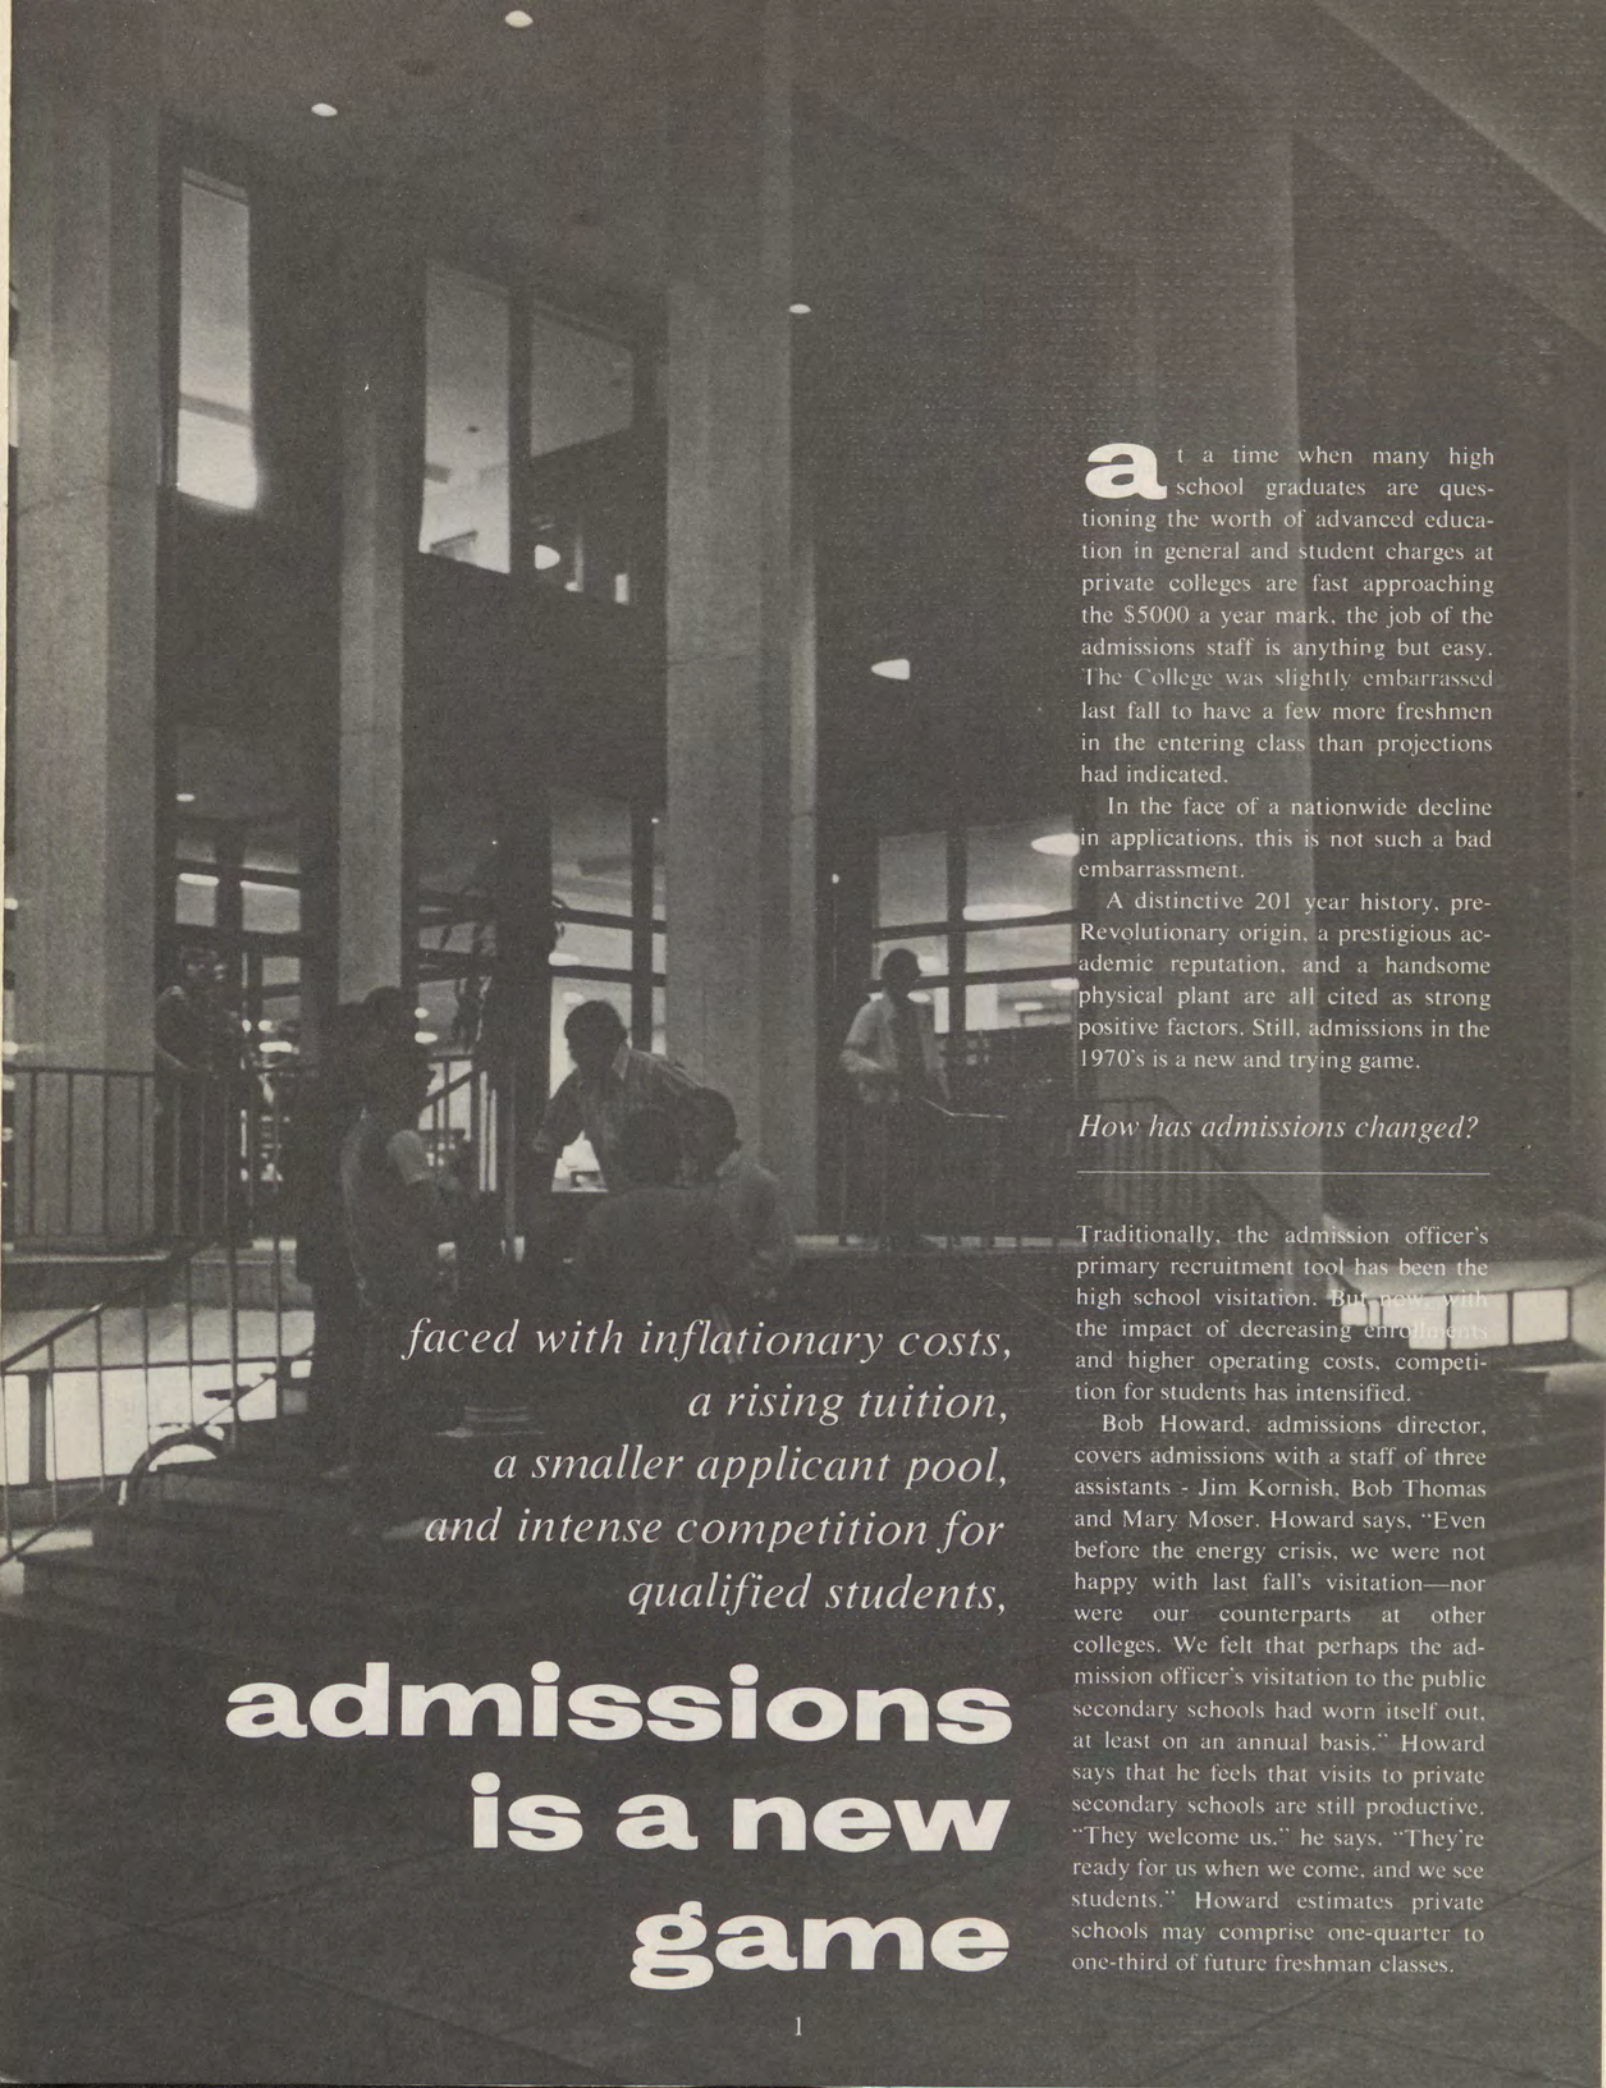

The decision to proceed with the directory was made only after wide-ranging studies into the best method of production. The Alumni Council, the governing body of the College's General Alumni Association, had indicated its feeling for the need of such publication some time ago. The possibility of College subsidization of the directory was explored but printing and distribution costs were found to be prohibitively high. Therefore, rather than use the institution's already put-upon operating funds for the purpose, it was decided that publication costs should be borne by the actual users of the volume.

The directory will contain nationwide listings and every alumnus whose name appears on the College's mailing list will be sent a form requesting information for inclusion in the directory. All information will be verified with each Dickinson alumnus by the Harris Company before publication and all will be given an opportunity to purchase a copy of the directory at that time. In addition, the individual also will be given the opportunity to become a sponsor at a slightly higher price or to take an advertisement for his or her business or corporation. Offers for the latter will be simple, straightforward and made only once.

Current plans call for publication in late January 1975.

The 1975 Directory of Living Alumni of Dickinson College will only be as complete as the information supplied to us by our alumni. We urge you to respond to mailings you receive promptly and completely. Thank you!

admissions is a new game

at a time when many high school graduates are questioning the worth of advanced education in general and student charges at private colleges are fast approaching the $5000 a year mark, the job of the admissions staff is anything but easy. The College was slightly embarrassed last fall to have a few more freshmen in the entering class than projections had indicated.

In the face of a nationwide decline in applications, this is not such a bad embarrassment.

A distinctive 201 year history, pre-Revolutionary origin, a prestigious academic reputation, and a handsome physical plant are all cited as strong positive factors. Still, admissions in the 1970's is a new and trying game.

How has admissions changed?

Traditionally, the admission officer's primary recruitment tool has been the high school visitation. But now, with the impact of decreasing enrollments and higher operating costs, competition for students has intensified.

Bob Howard, admissions director, covers admissions with a staff of three assistants - Jim Kornish, Bob Thomas and Mary Moser. Howard says, "Even before the energy crisis, we were not happy with last fall's visitation—nor were our counterparts at other colleges. We felt that perhaps the admission officer's visitation to the public secondary schools had worn itself out, at least on an annual basis." Howard says that he feels that visits to private secondary schools are still productive. "They welcome us," he says. "They're ready for us when we come, and we see students." Howard estimates private schools may comprise one-quarter to one-third of future freshman classes.

One alternative to school visitations may be to set up the admissions officer in a hotel or motel in various metropolitan areas and let the students come to him. This could make admissions contact available on a day long basis including evening hours.

The College is currently planning the implementation of an alumni recruitment group. Tentatively called the Alumni Admissions Committee, this would include a group of alumni who know the College as it exists today.

"The main thrust of the program will be in areas where we draw large numbers of students," says Howard, "but we also hope to involve alumni committees in more remote points such as Florida, St. Louis and Denver, areas where we're starting to get significant numbers of applications and where distance precludes the applicant ever seeing Dickinson."

To help them do their job, alumni admissions representatives will be brought to campus for a recruitment training session. They will then be prepared to counsel students in their home areas who want to talk about the College and they will be able to contact their local secondary school personnel.

This is one of the most important services that alumni can perform. You will be hearing more about this in the weeks and months ahead.

Finding the Dickinsonian

In the year just past, 489 freshmen were actually enrolled from over 2000 applicants.

How are the selections made?

In general, the admissions process considers the human side of the applicant, academic standing, secondary school's recommendation, and the results of tests.

Bob Howard is quick to point out that college board scores are just one part of the total evaluation.

"Boards are just an indication," he says, "and have to be weighed against many factors, as for example, whether the applicant went to a private or a public secondary school."

Student involvement in school activities is carefully considered. Effective performance in a few activities is more important than mere participation in a great many. The College's strength comes from a mix of involved students—musicians, athletes, actors and actresses, artists and others. Student involvement carries over in the undergraduate years in valuable community service in such programs as PEER and Big Brother.

Very important consideration is given to motivation. The College wants the student who enjoys learning and who "wants to come to Dickinson."

The College's low attrition and transfer rates are proof that admissions is finding the student who not only wants to come here, but wants to stay.

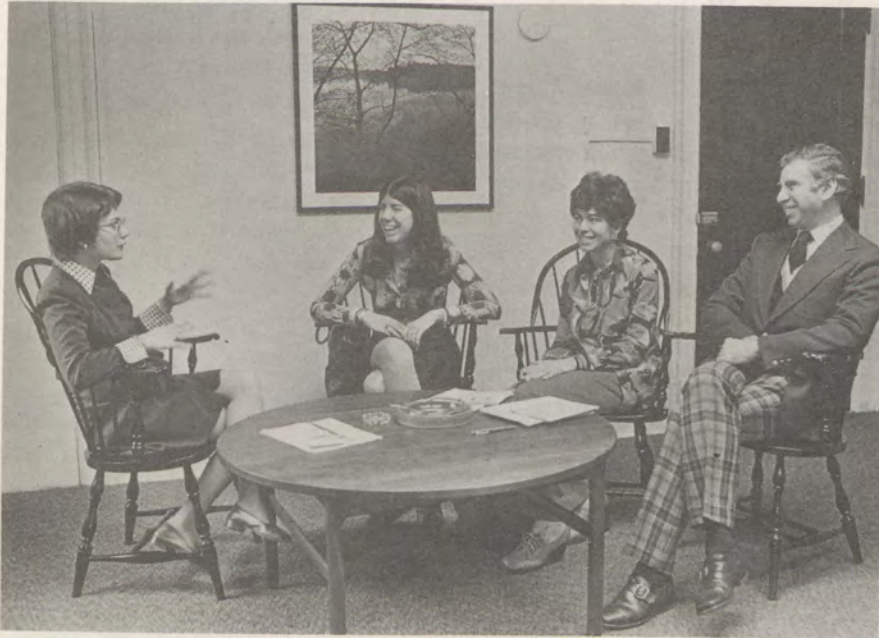

At the same time, the number of students transferring in to the College has grown in recent years.

Mailings and visits to junior colleges and community colleges have been increased. There have been as many as 75 transfers in one semester. "It's a rare year that we don't get at least a half dozen good students from a community college in our own backyard," reports Howard.

... but not least

The aim of the admissions operation is not just to fill the dormitories, but to fill them as heterogeneously as possible—and that's where there are complications.

A combination of high costs and limited financial aid has resulted in almost total absence of application from the lower middle class.

Spring is, according to admissions director Howard (far left) "our busiest season," with student-guided tours of the campus, individual and group interviews, and the laborious process of accepting and rejecting students from over 2,000 written applications.

The College's director of financial aid, Charles Twichell, reports that the financial squeeze on students from the middle income families is producing a bi-modal effect. Students from very low income families are eligible for the federal student aid programs and students from upper bracket families can afford the College's fees.

According to Twichell, approximately half of the students receive some monetary stipend. The part that comes from the state is always in the name of a particular student. Accompanying a single check is a list telling the College who the recipients are and how much they will receive.

Twichell explains that the College has made a commitment of an amount equal to 15 per cent of the net tuition income to financial aid. This covers all kinds of financial aid: direct grants, matching funds, student wages and prizes. If student heterogeneity is to be increased financial aid must be increased and this is very difficult when institutional costs in all areas are on the rise.

Obviously, part of the problem is inflation. What happens to the general economy has a direct effect on the College and on the ability of families to afford the cost of a Dickinson education.

The size of the College's endowment is an important factor. If the endowment were large enough to underwrite a healthy chunk of the total educational costs, this would be one way of controlling expenses. Although our endowment has grown, it is still modest.

The College's minority enrollment is lower than that in many comparable schools. Howard is not sure that it can ever be significantly higher: he notes that the factors affecting the black student's choice of a college are many and complex.

Minority enrollment remains low, despite the efforts of minority counselor Bill Sloan, who spends part of his time working with admissions and traveling to urban areas to reach significant concentrations of black population.

Sloan travels regularly into areas such as Philadelphia, Washington and Baltimore, and he has gone to Richmond, Atlanta and Memphis to talk about the College with prospective black students.

But again it comes down to money. The only way we can improve the minority situation is to increase the financial aid program substantially.

The happy ending

In spite of the many problems, the admissions picture is still strong. Forty-three per cent of this year's freshman class finished in the top tenth of their high school graduating class. They come from 22 states and nine different countries.

Alumni can help to keep the picture strong by encouraging good students to apply and by rendering as generous financial support as possible to help maintain the College's reputation for high academic quality.

CARLISLE, Pa. — All of us are familiar with the large-scale advertising campaign sponsored by glass, steel and aluminum-container manufacturers to convince the public that no-deposit no-return containers are good for the environment because they can be recycled. Few people realize that this campaign, which has been going on for almost three years, is being sponsored by the nation's glass, steel and aluminum-container manufacturers at a cost, so far, of over $10 million.

This well-financed campaign ignores recent studies saying that using throw-away beverage containers and then recycling them causes far more pollution and wasted energy than using returnable bottles.

The motives of the beverage-container manufacturers are easy to understand because these industries stand to lose the better part of $3 billion annually in retail sales if throwaways are restricted in favor of returnables. It is no wonder they can afford to spend a few million dollars a year producing what environmentalists call ecopornography.

And it is equally unsurprising that they can spend additional millions funding "Keep America Beautiful"—an organization that attempts to convince us that the problems caused by throwaway containers will disappear if Americans will only put them in litter cans.

This is the Pepsi generation, and the average American discards almost one beer or soft-drink container each day. That adds up to over sixty billion cans and bottles a year. It is well-established that throwaway beverage containers waste natural resources, produce mountains of trash, cause litter and pollution, and cost consumers money. The average household wastes about $40 a year purchasing these containers, but the tremendous amount of energy wasted in the recycling of beer and soda containers is not so obvious.

Recycling involves an endless, energy-consuming process of sorting, crushing, grinding, remelting and remanufacturing. If the no-deposit no-return cans and bottles discarded last year had been returnable bottles, the nation would have saved enough natural gas and crude oil to generate residential electricity for about eleven million relatively affluent residents last year. On an individual basis each beverage container we discard costs us about half a kilowatt-hour of electrical energy—enough to burn a 100-watt light for five hours.

While the container industry continues to squander energy, the nation is shivering. The federally mandated reduction in home-heating oil is requiring Eastern Seaboard residents to cut thermostats by six degrees. The fuel saved in eliminating throwaways in favor of returnable bottles would save enough oil to enable residential heating-oil users to turn their thermostats back up by three or four degrees. Where are our priorities? Why are we shivering in the dark while continuing to consume beverages in throwaway containers?

The State of Oregon has a successful mandatory deposit law that has effectively eliminated throwaway containers for carbonated beverages. Studies indicate that Oregon's deposit law has caused an increase in sales and employment, a saving of energy and resources, and a dramatic decrease in the amount of roadside litter. A similar bill has been introduced in the United States Senate by Senator Mark O. Hatfield of Oregon. It is vital that consumers be prepared to do battle with the strong container-industry lobby and get a nationwide deposit law passed.

anyone who will still risk a gas-eating drive through the Cumberland Valley might be surprised to hear a new voice booming from his car radio: Dickinson College. The student-operated radio station, WDCV, is now beaming educational FM, after years of broadcasting limited to the Dickinson campus. The change came after more than three years of struggle and preparation, application and testing. "We're very excited about it," said WDCV's David James '74, the station's special assistant for FM-Community affairs. "A lot of people have worked long and hard to achieve this change."

With official word from the Federal Communications Commission, WDCV began broadcasting a 65-hour week on October 31. Final approval of the technical facilities and programming will come after FCC inspection and testing, but, says Philip Wirth '74, the station manager, "we don't know exactly when."

It is estimated that the station's ten watt amplifier is reaching 25,000 people between the valley walls. But Wirth is still "unsure" about the response from off campus, though the closest educational channel is WITF-FM in Hershey, more than 30 miles away, which is affiliated with the Public Broadcasting System. He noted that the most popular WDCV program—the "oldies" program on Friday nights—has a large off-campus audience: "We get about 150 calls for requests, and a lot come from off campus." However, he also said that there was no way to be sure how many.

The addition of FM capacity has brought a surge of unexpected support from faculty, who, according to Wirth, see it as a way to expand their teaching potential. Several faculty have already asked for air time for lecture purposes. WDCV sees it as a real possibility, too. The station produces a campus forum and debate and broadcasted the full Public Affairs Symposium this February. "We also hope to interest local schools in some of our programming," added James, "possibly having classes listen to special broadcasts as supplements to their regular work."

Though over half of the station's broadcast time is devoted to "progressive rock" music, WDCV is, according to James, striving for "indigenous, top-quality programming." Surprisingly, the station has received both help and encouragement from two of the local AM stations which, according to Wirth, broadcast "top 40 and middle of the road" entertainment for public consumption. "They hope," noted Wirth, "that we can get more people to listen to the radio." Since the October debut, cooperation between WDCV and the locals has continued; WIOO feeds the College station ABC news to the College's 23-man news department. Other news and features come from UPI teletype, the Canadian Broadcasting System Corporation, and National Public Radio, which produces the "Composer's Corner."

Besides rock music and educational programs, WDCV is also broadcasting classical, jazz, folk, soul and "oldies" music, as well as live basketball and football.

A three-foot cube in the attic of Bosler Hall is responsible for the 10-watt beam and 10-mile radius of the College's programming. It augments AM broadcasting to College dormitories through power lines, which, since its inception more than 11 years ago in a classroom covered with eggcartons, has been WDCV's single broadcasting pipeline. Now, the station's $20,000 equipment—including turntables, amplifiers, recording and transmitting equipment—is located in the Holland Union basement, overseen by Larry Kovnat '74, technical director.

It has taken nearly four years to draw up the technical specifications, gather the capital, secure the approval of the Board of Trustees, and the FCC. According to Wirth, it will have been time well spent if WDCV can "provide a concept of campus life and activities" to the local community in addition to providing the campus sect with a lively supplement to local broadcasting.

As this issue of the Alumnus went to press, WDCV announced that the FCC has given final approval of its broadcast license.

For the past several weeks, however, the station has been unable to broadcast due to a malfunction in its transmitter, now being repaired by the manufacturer in Gloucester, New Jersey.

Dear Fellow Dickinsonian:

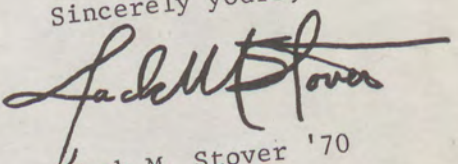

This past decade has witnessed an accelerated progression of major issues and crises for private colleges and universities which has left many such institutions in a state of considerable instability. Dickinson College, though not immune to such problems, has grown strong and become a recognized leader among liberal arts schools during the same period. Such institutional vigor in difficult times has not resulted from coincidence but rather from far-sighted leadership in all segments of the College community.

At the mid-point of the seventies, our College faces a decision which must inevitably result in profound and far-reaching effects - the selection of a new President. The Board of Trustees has begun an intensive one-year search for Dr. Rubendall's successor, aided by an advisory committee drawn from the various parts of the community. I am privileged to serve on that advisory committee as the representative of the President of the General Alumni Association.

Since an occasion of this sort offers to all of the College's graduates and friends a unique opportunity for contributing to the future of Dickinson and since the alumni of the College represent a vast potential resource of information, advice and nominations, I am writing this letter as an invitation to each alumnus or friend to participate in the process which we have begun. Your comments and suggestions, submitted to me at the address above, will be presented to the advisory committee and I will transmit any actual nominations to the Search Committee of the Board of Trustees.

For Dickinson's many loyal supporters, the challenge of selecting a new President provides an unusual means of working for the continued prosperity of the College. I hope and trust that many of you will join me in making our decision one which will guarantee a strong Dickinson for the next student generation.

Sincerely yours,

Jack M. Stover '70
