LETTER TO THE EDITOR

To the Editor:

Apparently, one area in Dickinson's daily life hasn't changed one iota since I graduated. Christina Bartolomeo's article on women and the social life at Dickinson brought it back to me all too clearly. I had very little to do with the quad and fraternities primarily due to it's atmosphere of a low-grade cross between a high school dance and a beerhall. The opinion many men still hold of women as inferiors is actually highlighted in a school the size of Dickinson which is, for all intents and purposes, cut off from the "real" world. Since my graduation, I have been working very hard to create a niche in a predominantly male field, and I regret to say that Dickinson gave me very little preparation to deal with men as colleagues and none to deal with them as subordinates. It was not until well after my graduation that I gained the confidence to go out and fight for what I wanted. And I must add, most thankfully, that contrary to my experience in college, men have been much more of an encouragement than a hindrance in my graduate studies and career plans. So, take heart Dickinson women! College is not a microcosm of American society, but a distortion of some of its best and worst characteristics.

Sincerely,

THE WEATHERVANE

There was a time, and not so long ago, that summers on college campuses were for reflection, for finishing up all the things held over from winter, for leisurely planning.

Summer schools went on, but quietly. Maintenance people cut the grass, repaired a few roofs, did some painting. It was all rather calm and very pleasant.

No more.

A successful college these days is almost as busy during the summer as it is during the winter. Dickinson is a successful college. And this year the admissions office compounded things by being a bit more successful than anyone had quite expected. The campus is not very quiet this summer; and the College's maintenance crews are going full tilt.

There is the usual preparation of residence halls and classrooms for the coming semester. Grass is being cut, trees and flowers pruned, and sidewalks are being laid. Renovation is underway to turn Alumni Gym into an arts center.

Added to that is a certain amount of rearrangement, almost musical chairs. Some fraternities have moved out of the quadrangle, and some special interest groups have moved in. And that successful admissions effort referred to created a need for more housing.

So the communications and development building, once the Phi Delt house and this fall renamed Stuart House in honor of J. William Stuart '32, is being renovated for student housing. A modular building was constructed in a very short span of time, and this summer the C and D division is being moved into it. It is next to South College on Church Avenue, just behind Alumni Gymnasium.

This magazine is housed in that building. This is a summer. NLW

Our Man at State

William Soff '81

High above "C" Street in the famous Washington section called Foggy Bottom, a fellow Dickinsonian carefully makes plans and recommendations for one of the most powerful men in world affairs. On the legendary seventh floor of the State Department, Sherwood Goldberg '63 fulfills his role as the executive assistant to the Secretary of State.

Mr. Goldberg is no stranger on the American foreign policy scene. After leaving Dickinson, he received a master's degree in international relations from Temple, and he has served in several capacities overseas for the Army. He has also known Secretary Haig for many years.

I met Mr. Goldberg this spring in his spacious office. Surrounded by priceless American colonial antiques, oils of famous American Secretaries, and the seals of the President and the Department of State, I could not help being held in awe for the first few minutes. It was quite a change from my room on campus. Out the window was a spectacular view of the Lincoln Memorial, and just beyond the wall was the Secretary of State's personal office.

Working directly for the Secretary of State means Mr. Goldberg is very busy. My time was, therefore, limited. We soon began talking about Dickinson.

I have always found it interesting to see how alumni reflect on their days at Dickinson, and Mr. Goldberg seemed to thoroughly enjoy his four years in Carlisle. He fondly remembered freshman year in Old East (now the Bernard Center) and life as a SAE brother of the early 1960s. We compared the social life of then and now, the curriculum, life in Carlisle, and even a few professors.

Some names have changed, some new buildings have appeared, and some different courses have been added, but the Dickinson of the early 1960s sounded much like the Dickinson of the early 1980s. Mr. Goldberg told me how important a Dickinson education is to him, and he added with pride how much respect Dickinson is accorded around Washington.

We could have talked about Dickinson all afternoon, but I had some specific questions I wanted to ask Mr. Goldberg concerning his new (at that time) position.

Dickinson Magazine

Exactly, what is the role of the executive assistant, as you see it?

Mr. Goldberg

"My purpose is to enhance his (the Secretary of State's) ability to do his job by serving as his alter ego . . . I must understand fully what the Secretary is doing and what enhances and/or detracts his ability to do things. I help him plan out each day, week, and month, making sure he has time to read, have consultations, etc. I am also in constant contact with the White House and Congress, often acting as the interface between them, the Department of State, and the public. Yes, I help keep the public informed on what's up around here."

Dickinson Magazine

So you are, in effect, Secretary Haig's personal chief of staff? That is quite a responsibility.

Mr. Goldberg

"Well, it requires a 24-hour, seven-day-a-week commitment on my part, but I enjoy it. The only drawback is that my wife and home are in Philadelphia, and with my schedule, it is difficult for me to get home often. So, I've got an apartment here in Washington, and my wife comes down on weekends."

Dickinson Magazine

Being in a new and dynamic administration, how do you feel about your situation? Are you sort of feeling your way along, or is everything well defined and following a set pattern?

Mr. Goldberg

"President Reagan and Secretary Haig knew exactly what had to be done in American foreign affairs. Everything is running very well so far. Responses by our friends and allies have been very good, which is quite encouraging.

William Soff

"Almost every procedure here has been well defined, but the structure is fairly flexible to meet new demands when the situation arises. This flexibility is crucial when considering the pace of current international changes. A good example of the department's efficiency could be seen on Inauguration Day. While the nation was celebrating the Reagan inaugural, the State Department never missed a beat, even as we secured the release of our Iranian hostages.

"In response to the first part of the question, I am very pleased and excited to be a part of so dynamic an organization."

Dickinson Magazine

Were you appointed by Mr. Haig? If so, how did the two of you come together?

Mr. Goldberg (laughing)

"To make a long story short, Secretary Haig and I have known each other for many years. Mr. Haig and I first came into contact with each other several years after I left Dickinson. I served

The structure is flexible enough to meet new demands.

under Mr. Haig in Vietnam, and we both taught at West Point. In July 1979, General Haig asked me to accompany him on his 40-state, seven-country tour. He was with NATO at that time. We had already become very close friends.

"Anyway, after his NATO career and my Army career, General Haig and I each went our different ways. This was March 1980. I went home to Philadelphia to practice law, and General Haig left to pursue a career with a large corporation. We remained in contact with each other, but we saw each other rarely.

"Then in December (1980), my wife and I went to Florida for a vacation. We barely had our bags unpacked when I got a phone call from Washington. It was Secretary-Designate Haig. He asked me if I could be in Washington the next day. I talked it over with my wife and took the first flight to Washington the next day. My wife stayed in Florida to finish her vacation. When I got to Washington, Mr. Haig asked me to be his executive assistant. I was very honored that he asked me, and I accepted the position."

Dickinson Magazine

Decision-making responsibility within the State Department follows a hierarchical pattern of organization. Where exactly do you sit in the hierarchy (especially in relation to such offices as the Deputy Secretary of State, the Undersecretaries, etc.)?

Mr. Goldberg

"I am a member of the Secretariat Staff, which is the Secretary's personal staff. I'm not in the chain of command or hierarchy you referred to. Instead, I am one of Secretary Haig's personal advisors."

I glanced up at the clock and realized that my time was nearly up. Mr. Goldberg's secretary came into the office to remind him of a staff meeting with Mr. Haig, but I wanted to squeeze in one more question before saying goodbye.

Dickinson Magazine

If you are not in the chain of command, what input or role do you have in the formulation or implementation of American foreign policy?

Mr. Goldberg

"As a member of the Secretary's personal staff, I don't really have an input into the formulation or implementation of our foreign policy. Policy recommendations are made along the structural hierarchy of the department. As I mentioned earlier, my role is to help the Secretary do his job to the best of his ability."

With that, Mr. Goldberg and I left his office, he going to meet with Secretary Haig and me off for Carlisle. I thanked Mr. Goldberg for taking the time to see us and for providing such an exciting day for me. I know all of us in the Dickinson family are extremely proud of Mr. Goldberg and wish him continued success. ■

It is Play, not Work

Mary Cappello '82

It was about this time last year that my sophomore-year roommate and co-founder of the Arts House, Ginger Houpt, wrote me an excited letter saying that she was about to embark on a musical adventure.

She and another young Dickinson alumnus, David Hildebrand, were seriously considering settling in Annapolis, Maryland in order to pursue music, more than in a spirit of fun, but because music to them was a belief and way of living; because playing music was something they loved and enjoyed.

Now, just one year later, their impressive résumé proves their successful beginning to what could flower into a lifetime endeavor—life as professional musicians.

For all of the great and abundant talent at Dickinson, I think it is an accurate assertion that few pursue their art beyond the few years of undergraduate practice and performance. Many fulfill the expectations of others through so-called "practical" majors that lie far from personal challenge or interest and counter to the artistic urge—expression as a means of sustenance.

Ginger and David both had sight of the "insecure" reputation of music as a profession. In fact when music took first priority in their lives, David said, "I almost frightened my parents to death." However, the diverse musical duo revel in what David expresses as "the joy of being a self-contained growing force."

It is this joy in following their heart and talent that has diminished "the line between work and play" according to Ginger, though this is not to imply that earning a living through music is free from difficulties. They have worked out a schedule of business, booking, publicity in the morning, and practice at least two hours every day (admitting that they should be practicing six hours per day). In the pursuit to budget time, practicing always comes first or working on original songs that they've neglected—songs written two or three years ago that they had formerly lacked the time to refine.

With their combined extensive musical training and motivation the duo has gained recognition in Annapolis. Their free approach to music is complemented by a diverse repertoire. They perform classical, baroque, contemporary, folk, international, and original styles, employing classical and folk guitars, violin, (fiddle), flute, banjo, voices, and occasionally harpsichord.

Over the year they have been featured in various programs at the Hammond-Harwood House, Tawes Garden summer noon concerts, noontime diversions at St. Anne's Church, the Dockside Lounge, the Arnold Senior Center, and elementary schools in the Annapolis area. Their most recent booking is at the Maryland Inn on Mondays.

Their work with the elementary schools is composed of an American folk music presentation for children, which Ginger aptly describes as "music of the folk." This program includes the story of folk music, introductions of many folk instruments, and participation in some popular folk songs.

For their coffee house entertainment they present a program of soft-rock pieces from the 60s and 70s as well as classical, Irish, folk, and original melodies. And if you were to attend a Houpt/Hildebrand Baroque-Classical Candlelight Concert you would enjoy a fine performance of smaller works of Haydn, Bach, and Mozart for flute and guitar.

After performing at several fine arts festivals throughout the Annapolis area this summer, Ginger and David will present a concert of sea songs at the Chesapeake Maritime Museum, St. Michael's, Maryland, September 12, 8:00-10:00.

When we met again it was a cold day for spring and Ginger and David had left their coats in the car to warm the guitars, to safeguard the instruments. Later, David spoke of how "each instrument has a lore—you could spend many lifetimes on the classical guitar." I thought of how fully they were exploring their love of music and how they turned the noun to verb with the active grace of true artists in making something very difficult appear to be very easy—an ease borne of their own philosophy: "Even though we earn our living as performing musicians, the music itself takes highest priority. . . . We love to share our music and cannot emphasize enough that this is our goal, it is play, not work, and we love it." ■

Tibet—The Roof of the World

Wilbur M. Rabinowitz '40

The autonomous region of Tibet today is a part of The People's Republic of China (as it has been for most of its very long history) being situated in the south-western portion of that country. It is huge, representing about one eighth of China's total area. Yet, although China has a total population of over 900,000,000, Tibet is the home of only about 1½ million, an indication of the extremely harsh environment.

The average altitude is more than 15,000 feet, ranging from mountain peaks of over 25,000 feet to those of a minimum of 10,000 or so. The landscape is stark, consisting of broad valleys and large plains. Very sharp mountains rising to some 8,000 feet above the valley floor, project up sharply and suddenly from the valley.

Audrey, my wife, and I were there in the second half of October, 1980 as part of a group of 27 which in turn was a portion of the total of about 700 or 800 admitted during the year.

We flew to Lhasa from the United States via Hong Kong, Canton, and Chengdu, the latter being located in the western part of China and the capital of Szechuan province. From Chengdu it is about a three-hour flight to Lhasa.

Oddly enough the airport is a considerable distance from the city, about 70 miles, although there were areas closer to the city which would have been good sites. We understand that when the airport was first built, for reasons of internal security, it was decided to build it at a considerable distance from the city. The result is a four-hour mini-bus ride over an unpaved and dusty road to the city. So dusty is the ride that we were supplied with surgical masks as protection for our throats.

When we reached Lhasa we found accommodations less than palatial. We did have private rooms and semi-private baths. However, the structures were one-story stone buildings, unheated, and with no running hot water. Rugged by international travel standards but still not really bad.

What was more of a problem was the altitude. At 12,500 feet one feels the thin air, and most of our group reacted in a variety of ways: nausea, splitting headaches, shortness of breath, lassitude, sleeplessness. We were soon experts on the symptoms of altitude sickness.

The scenery was magnificently mountainous. The very few trees are generally around irrigation ditches or along the river. The sharp tall mountains were, in October, snowcapped, but there was no snow in the city. The population lives generally on agriculture (barley, wheat, cotton, vegetables) and livestock (yaks, sheep, goats, horses). The yak is the principal beast of burden and is the source of wool, milk, butter (usually rancid), and cheese. Beef cattle generally don't survive in this high altitude but the yak is acclimated to the heights.

The history of Tibet is quite complex. In brief, it was a part of China through most of its history, which goes back more than 2,000 years. At various times it was independent, the last time being in the earlier part of this century. In 1950 the government of The People's Republic of China, by means of both armed invasion and diplomatic efforts (although there was no bloodshed), took over the country. In 1959 there was a very brief and almost bloodless revolt which failed. The Dalai Lama, who was the secular and religious ruler of the country, fled and is now living in India. There are negotiations currently underway for his return.

During its history prior to 1950, the country was a primitive serfdom. The term "lord and master" applied literally. Such people made up approximately 5 percent of the population, with another 5 percent in the monasteries. The rest were serfs over whom the nobility had total power of life and death.

Prior to 1950 the country had been almost totally isolated. It is estimated that in the three centuries preceding 1950 not more than 100 foreigners reached Tibet, and only a few of those were permitted into the city of Lhasa. Looking at the geography, one understands the reason for this isolation: Tibet is surrounded on three sides by extremely high, harsh mountains through which a trek is most difficult. To the north is the remote western area of China. In the newly-formed art school we were shown a piano, newly arrived from Chengdu. It had come by truck, an 11-day trip.

Ethnically, the people are not Chinese but rather Mongol and Tartar, and we found them a rather handsome group. Although unaccustomed to foreigners, they are very friendly. In every direction we were acknowledged by smiles, and we aroused a great deal of curiosity. When we walked through a crowd we found the people touching us. They would take our hand or feel our arm and press in against us in a crowd. If we stopped at the market to examine some household item, or to bargain with a peddler, a crowd immediately gathered, crowding in on us five and ten deep. There was nothing threatening in this, but rather an expression of friendliness. Of course, conversation was impossible, except through the local interpreter who accompanied our group.

The people are extremely primitive and unsanitary. Baths are literally not taken from one year to the next. To compound that, it is customary to cover the skin with yak butter as protection against the cold wind and the strong sunlight; it is unnecessary to describe what happens after this turns rancid. The homes are unheated. Running water is generally not available. Ditto electricity.

The population is about 95 percent illiterate, although steps are being taken to teach reading and writing. On the other hand, the people are very devout. The religion is a branch of Buddhism, with the Dalai Lama as the supreme and absolute head. The Panchen Lama is his equal in religious, but not in secular matters. We were told that until 1950 there were no wheels in the country for fear that the disturbance of the earth made by a wheel would be anti-religious.

We saw many temples, shrines, and places of worship. Most of the monasteries have been emptied since the Chinese came in 1950. For example, we visited Drepung, situated about four miles from Lhasa. Until 1950 it had about 10,000 monks who led a monastic life similar to what must have existed in monasteries in the Middle Ages. There are now only 250 monks in Drepung. It is still huge, however, and well maintained. We found it visited by a few pilgrims from all over Tibet, who, as an act of faith, will make a pilgrimage to many of the temples around Lhasa a few times in their lifetime.

An examination of Drepung shows a series of buildings, consisting of temples, shrines, small rooms in which to live, and stables. The buildings are full of altars, shrines, tapestries, paintings, and much gold. Most of the decorations on the buildings are gold sheet.

Despite the atheistic policies of the Chinese government, over 90 percent of the people are still very religious, superstitious, and devout. From 1950 to 1980 no novices were permitted to enter the priesthood. The result is that those monks who did stay are now middle aged or older. However, beginning in 1980, the Chinese are again permitting novices, and one sees a few six- and eight-year-old boys in the temples starting a life of devotion.

We found Tibet to be a rugged country to visit in the sense of lack of accommodations and extremely high altitude. But it was certainly worth it. There are only a handful of people now permitted to enter Tibet; the government has adopted this policy not out of any anti-foreign bias, but because it recognizes that there is a shortage of interpreters, hotels, restaurants, and transportation facilities. They just couldn't physically handle any sizable amount of tourism.

When China was first opened to western tourism in 1977, to a lesser degree the same conditions prevailed. China is now more accessible because the facilities have been expanded. Perhaps this will happen for Tibet in the foreseeable future. In a sense, I hope it does not because any sizable influx of tourism would have a serious effect on a country as thinly populated as this. Nor should Tibet be spoiled. It is totally charming, full of warm and, underneath the surface dirt, fine people.

My wife and I have traveled to many places on this planet. We found this to be just about the most interesting and attractive. ■

Spending a year or a semester abroad is becoming more and more popular with Dickinson students who take advantage of the numerous programs the College offers. There are Dickinson summer programs in Britain and Nantes or the year-long programs in Bologna and Colombia. There also are many other overseas programs with which the College is affiliated.

Dickinson encourages its students to leave the traditional classroom in order to pursue a different kind of learning experience. Ideally, off-campus studies should supplement one's on-campus learning experience; therefore the two should be well integrated. It is essential that studies abroad are carefully planned out well in advance. Most students desiring to spend junior year abroad should start planning early in their sophomore year. Students meet with Prof. John Henderson, director of off-campus studies, to discuss possible programs. Together they decide what program is appropriate to the student's needs.

I acquired new insights and reshaped my values.

Students who are interested in spending a junior year abroad to study European politics, history, economics, and international affairs, may apply to the College's program in Bologna, Italy. Twenty-five students are accepted each year, and courses are taught in English by the Dickinson director and Italian faculty members from the surrounding universities. Although no particular major is required for this program, students who have not taken Italian for a semester will be required to do so in Bologna.

The Colombia Program is a semester of study in Medellín. Students leave in early July and return to the United States at the end of the fall semester. This program is designed for students who are interested in Latin American studies and who have a working knowledge of the Spanish language. The courses are taught at the regular Colombian university; thus participants have direct contact with Colombian students. In addition, students on this program live with Colombian families, which is considered to be an integral part of the program.

All of the Dickinson-affiliated programs offer financial aid opportunities and in some cases work-study is available.

While studying abroad may not be perfect for everyone, there is something extremely special about living in another country. It is very difficult for me to describe in a nut shell all of the insights I gained from spending the first semester of my senior year in Aix-en-Provence, France. My experience enriched my life as well as enhanced my liberal arts education. I could actually see what I was learning in my courses in both the literal and figurative sense. I visited Arles while my art history class discussed Van Gogh's biography. I hiked up Mt. Sainte-Victoire, the mountain Cezanne painted, and I walked upon the same narrow cobble-stoned streets that the Romans had once traveled upon.

In addition to expanding my knowledge, living in France afforded me the opportunity to learn about myself. I acquired new insights, reshaped values, and formed new opinions as a result of my experience. One of the biggest lessons I learned was how little I really did know. Yes, after four years of high school French and one year in college, I thought that I was well prepared for a new exciting life in France—I wasn't.

I remember my first meeting with Madame Dauplay, the landlady of our tiny studio apartment. Her high pitched, quick-as-a-bullet voice, frustrated me to tears that first night. "Why did I come here," I wondered.

The next day I spent exploring the town by myself—that was not too fruitful either. It took me several attempts to gather up enough courage to leave the house. Feeling somewhat nervous, I thought, "What will I do if something should happen, if I get hurt or mugged, how will I tell these people. Help! What am I doing here?"

Then after the anxiety subsided, I had to contend with all kinds of embarrassment—stares, laughter, and yelling. Some man verbally abused me in the grocery store because I held up the line as I fumbled with my francs. My face grew warm with self-consciousness as he stormed off in a huff. After that I decided to retreat into a nearby cafe thinking that I would be safe from further humiliation. I ordered a ham and cheese sandwich on that delicious crusty French bread, and that's precisely what I got—a ham and a cheese sandwich. Sparing myself from a hassle, I paid for both. That day was enough to drive me back to the security of Carlisle!

Just as the smallest hurdles often seemed magnified ten times over, so were the minor accomplishments. My slow progress with the language and cultural barriers thoroughly depressed me at times. But I was elated for several days after the teller in the bank told me that he thought that my French was improving. The emotional ups and downs seemed so much more pronounced when I was in Europe, and yet, as the weeks flew by, my self-confidence, independence, and sense of humor developed. All of those embarrassments, the feelings of total helplessness and stupidity could be shrugged off or laughed away with ease. What I once considered as French idiosyncrasies actually made sense to me. In short, by the end of my semester, I felt as if I was finally integrating into the French way of life, and that was a very gratifying feeling.

My advice to anyone who has the opportunity to study abroad is Do It! You may never have the chance to go if you don't take advantage now.

Dickinson In Bologna

This spring Dickinson celebrated the 15th anniversary of its Bologna program with a special series of events in the Italian city.

Dr. and Mrs. Sam A. Banks and Professors George Rhyne and Charles Jarvis joined the Dickinson students and Director Robert Nilsson for the celebration. In the spring of 1966 Dr. Howard Rubendall, then president, and Samuel W. Witwer, then president of the board of trustees, had visited the newly opened program.

This spring's events began when the visiting group and Professor Nilsson had dinner Thursday, May 7 with the rector of the University of Bologna and his assistant and Prof. Marco Biagi who teaches for Dickinson in Bologna. Friday evening there was a reception with the mayor of Bologna and a dinner for 75 people at La Torre, a restaurant located in a medieval tower.

Among those at the dinner celebration were the American consul and his wife from Florence, the prefect of Bologna (the highest ranking local dignitary), various civic representatives, the Italian professors who teach for Dickinson, the head of the USICA office in Florence, 11 of the 16 Italian students who have studied at Dickinson on scholarships, the 24 students in the program, and the Dickinson party.

Saturday morning at the University, Dickinson sponsored a conference on "The Labor Union Movement in the Europe of the 80s." After lunch with the mayor, the Dickinson group visited with the rector of the Collegio di Spagna, a 600-year-old college in the center of Bologna.

While the celebration was taking place, Dr. Banks and Professor Nilsson were interviewed by a feature writer from Il Resto Del Carlino, the Bologna paper, which ran two articles, one on the anniversary of the program and another on Dickinson itself.

Dickinson is convinced, Prof. George Rhyne has said, that the Bologna program is not only intellectually of high caliber but also that it fulfills liberal arts goals in a unique way. In a speech in Omaha this year, he talked about the program.

"The beauty of study abroad," he said, "where it is done well, is that it pushes the student out into the world that is the topic of study. In doing so, it accomplishes the ends of the liberal education almost automatically, regardless of what subjects are included in the curriculum. By integrating himself more or less fully into his host society, in his daily routine, and in his personal contacts, the student is necessarily exposed to different mores, values, and cultural and political processes. He is thereby forced continually to make contrasts and comparisons between his host society and his own and to evaluate them."

Dickinson has introduced a course on the city of Bologna which, Professor Rhyne said, gives students the chance to perceive "at first hand the close reciprocal ties between the individual and the community." Professor Rhyne went on to discuss why Bologna is particularly advantageous for foreign study. He referred to "the absence of tourists, the smaller number of fellow nationals, and the more authentic nature of the society make it easier to find the real Italy."

Following is a list of those students from the very first Bologna group for whom the College has current addresses and about whom it has recent knowledge. Their experience, according to George Honadle, caused some to change their career plans. He says he was one of them. The list is representative of the kinds of careers being followed by subsequent Bologna program graduates.

Megan McHugh is the psychology department's animal caretaker.

A walk across the Dickinson campus on a sunny late April or early May day will expose sunbathers, tennis players, and final exams procrastinators. But many students cannot spend their spare time flinging a frisbee on Morgan Field.

These students set time apart from their studies to earn money, either as part of the college-work-study program or as institutional employees.

Despite their busy schedules, however, most of the students I've spoken with are happy to have jobs to help pay for their education. I'm no exception.

As an employee of John Ross, director of public information services, I'm responsible for writing news releases on cultural events at Dickinson and sending them to area newspapers and radio and television stations.

Because mine is such an interesting job, I began to wonder what my fellow student workers thought about theirs. I found a wide variety of jobs, ranging from tour guides to athletic trainers.

Tom Dermott, a rising junior, works for Howard Baum, director of auxiliary services. He said, "Mr. Baum really looks out for his employees. He tries to schedule you around your classes so you can have free time." Tom performs tasks like stocking shelves in the book store and delivering laundry to the law school.

Marty D'Luzansky '83 delivers dinners. He's a food service employee. "I hate the dishroom, and I like serving best," he commented. "I think it's because of the exposure. You get to see everyone as they come in to eat."

One student, Megan McHugh '83, cooks on the grill and serves ice cream in the snack bar, buses dishes for food service, and feeds rats.

"I clean the cages every once in awhile, too," Megan said, referring to her job as animal caretaker for the psychology department. Megan, who would like to develop her own major in physiological psychology, checks on the animals every afternoon, seven days a week.

She's learned that "pigeons are nasty creatures, but the rats are adorable."

William Conwell '81 also had a job that basically required him "to be there and be responsible," he said. He worked for student services as the night supervisor of the Holland Union Building.

While on duty, Bill was in charge of monitoring sideroom and social hall activities from 5 P.M. until midnight. He locked doors, turned out lights, and made sure everyone was out of the Union before leaving for the night.

Bill recalled last year's busy homecoming weekend. "Everyone wanted to be outside; no one really wanted to work. Then a pipe leaked in the basement, so I had to vacuum water for awhile."

Bruce Barrow '83 also works with water and responsibility. He's a lifeguard at the Kline Center pool.

To get the job, Bruce had to be certified by the Red Cross, of course. He noted that he gets an opportunity to swim—"that's not very difficult work" —but he mostly sees that no rules are violated and that everyone around the pool is safe.

John Statler, a rising senior, must believe that a time for work and a time for play are one and the same thing. His job as game room supervisor "is the greatest," he claims.

John's responsible for providing change for the electronic games, signing out ping-pong and pool equipment, and "making sure people don't beat up the machines if they lose," he said. Two years of experience in the game room job have shown John that more people are coming in for a few minutes between classes. "The new 'space invaders' game really draws people," he added.

While some students "get away from it all" by playing pinball, others arrange to study abroad. So Jackie Bedway '83 is there to help them. Jackie works in the office of off-campus studies.

She keeps the files of Dickinson's special programs and the catalogues from other colleges and shows pamphlets to students who want to study off campus. "I find out a lot about other countries," Jackie said. "Now I can't wait to go abroad sometime."

Tina Carter '82 has another illuminating job. As a teaching assistant for the media department, she critiques prints developed by students and helps out in the darkroom.

"It's fun," this fine arts major said. "I don't mind helping people."

Richard Fagan '82 is gaining much more from his Latin major and job as a Latin tutor than money. He likes Latin and Greek and wants to be a teacher, so he's getting practical experience. In fact, he hopes to teach at the college level.

Some students, like Beth Ann Crocker '82, have combined their campus job with a career internship. Beth Ann works in the computer center as a data entry clerk. She takes orders from various campus offices for lists or mailing labels and "runs" the computer program that prints them.

Bill Conwell is student supervisor in the Holland Union Building.

Because of an internship in the computer center, her job work has been expanded.

"If you see lists or labels, I've probably done 'em," Beth Ann grinned and said.

Lori Atwell, a rising sophomore, works in an area that is seldom recognized but is seriously important.

She is the student assistant adviser for ALKY—Alcohol Learning and Knowledge for You—a program started by Wanda Ruffin of the counseling center. She is responsible for sending correspondence, filing information about ALKY, and publicizing its various programs.

"What I like best is informing people that using alcohol isn't really necessary, but that if they have to drink, they should drink responsibly," Lori said.

Linda Fisher '83 also works for Wanda Ruffin as the coordinator of the tutoring program. When students come to the counseling center for academic help, Linda explained, she matches them up with an appropriate tutor. Linda also reads goal and progress reports, prepares information for tutor-training programs, and works with professors to find out what students would make good tutors.

"I see how students are working together," Linda said. "I like it a lot. There's a lot of contact with people."

Most of the students I contacted said that getting to meet a lot of people was one of the most enjoyable parts of their jobs. Person-to-person relationships seem to be bonuses to the checks which warm our mailboxes on payday.

Now that summer's here, however, hopefully the student workers have time to be warmed in their own place in the sun. ■

Cathy Phillips is from Shillington, Pennsylvania. With summer work as a reporter, her campus job, and a major in English, Cathy is preparing for a career in journalism.

One Year Later

Wendy Simmons '83

Classroom education is only part of a student's experience at Dickinson even though it is the major part. It is the other area—activities outside the classroom—which completes our liberal arts education.

A wealth of extracurricular activities are available to every student. They range from participation in sports or singing in the college choir to developing an internship. All of these experiences can enrich a student's education, sharpen skills, and open new doors. Several Dickinsonians took advantage of a unique opportunity last spring to participate in the publication of a student issue of The Dickinson Magazine.

In the fall of his senior year, Arthur Wasserman planned to intern at the communications and development office on campus. Nancy Winkelman, editor of The Dickinson Magazine, proposed the idea of a special issue of the magazine: one issue completely written and produced by students. Arthur took the initiative and became the editor as a part of his internship.

Once the decision had been made to do the special issue, Arthur and several other talented student writers, under the guidance of Prof. Sharon O'Brien, were able to apply theories learned in the classroom to a real-life situation. Although the road was rough at times, the students gained a kind of practical knowledge that no class at Dickinson could offer.

One year later, when asked to reflect upon their common experience with The Dickinson Magazine, all of the participating students felt it had been a positive and rewarding activity.

Arthur was an anthropology major and a Spanish minor at Dickinson. As a result of his internship with the communications and development division, he felt directed toward work in a college.

"I wanted to be in that special intellectual and cultural environment," he asserted.

Arthur is currently working as an admissions counselor for Blackburn

College in Carlinville, Illinois. His main job is to recruit students from the Chicago area. In addition, he interviews prospective students and reviews their applications.

"It's very rewarding," Arthur commented, "to review an application, accept the student, then see that person come to Blackburn and excel."

Arthur's future goal is to move up to fund raising and development. "This first job is really a stepping stone to my ultimate goal. I want to stay in education but perhaps move to a larger college or to a metropolitan area."

Without a doubt, Arthur feels that his years at Dickinson were valuable. In addition, he felt that, "My internship at communications and development was really phenomenal—it honed my writing and editing skills and exposed me to areas which I had not ever come into contact with before."

Arthur remembers the pang of fear which gripped him his senior year—the realization that his college years were almost over. However, he asserts, "... there is life after graduation, and I am enjoying it."

Pamela Gelson, an English major and fine arts minor, also graduated in 1980. Currently, Pamela is working for Glamour Magazine in New York. Her job is to answer questions concerning beauty and health problems from women who write to the magazine seeking advice. All the questions that Glamour receives are answered; only a few are published.

"I am not making a career out of this," Pamela declared, "but it's a start."

Pamela got this job by first sending writing samples to the magazine, then answering sample questions. "The only psychology course I ever took was intro. It was my writing skills, sharpened at college, that enabled me to evaluate the problem and devise good solutions."

Pamela's is a 9-5 day in which she answers about 20 questions. One basic frustration for her is "being chained to a desk." However, she loves the prestige that comes from working for Glamour.

Art Wasserman

Especially rewarding is when readers write, "thanking me for my advice. It's great to know that I helped someone."

Pamela originally wanted to be a fashion writer. She has changed her mind and now would like to work in the fashion department of a large magazine.

Pamela feels that anyone's first job "helps you to find out what you really want to do." With a new sense of direction, she is ready to move on.

Another member of the 1980 class who worked on the magazine was Colleen Geraghty. An English major at Dickinson, she is now working at Wagner College on Staten Island, New York. She is the assistant director of admissions, acting as a representative for the college as she travels to various high schools.

"You know that you have done your job when you see students at their high schools, then review their application."

Colleen's future goals include working in public relations or advertising. "This

The organizational skills I learned helped me.

job is just a stepping stone," she stated. "I hope to move on."

Colleen feels that her experience at Dickinson helped her to become a well-rounded person. "Meeting people at Dickinson has helped me to deal with people on the job."

Colleen enjoys writing and hopes to use her skills in the future. "My years at Dickinson enabled me to excel in this area. The magazine work was wonderful!"

Lindsey Clapp, Class of '81, was one of two juniors who wrote articles for the special issue. An English major and education minor, Lindsey plans to attend Gordon-Conwell Theological Seminary this fall. She will participate in a three-year program, leading to a Master of Divinity degree. Lindsey hopes to use this degree for youth ministry and Christian publications.

During her busy years at Dickinson, Lindsey also interned at communications and development. "It was very rewarding," she commented, "and gave me the flavor of working in publications."

This spring, Lindsey practice taught English at a local high school, fulfilling requirements for her education minor. "It's exciting to see people learning. I'd like to use my writing skills to foster this learning process."

Joan Sommers is also a 1981 graduate and is an English major and education minor.

First semester of her senior year, Joan interned at the Bar Association in

Lindsey Clapp

Harrisburg, doing research. "I got this position because of my article in The Dickinson Magazine. The director of public relations at the Bar somehow saw my article, liked it, and asked Mrs. Best in the internship office if I would be interested in an internship." Joan, who wanted an internship utilizing research skills, jumped at the chance.

"The organizational skills I learned from working on the magazine really helped me," claimed Joan.

Joan also did practice teaching in

Joan Sommers

English at a high school. "It's quite a challenge," she admits. "It's difficult to state an idea, break it apart, and then present it in such a way that the students can relate to it."

Joan plans to work in a publishing or an advertising company, but in late spring had no definite plans.

"Any entry level job will not be that exciting. It's a period of self-examination." Joan feels confident about the future because, "Liberal arts give you a lot of flexibility."

The transition from the classroom to the job market can be difficult. Extracurricular activities during college can help bridge this gap. Graduates such as Arthur, Pamela, Colleen, Lindsey, and Joan attest to the value of such experiences. ■

The College

Trustees Meet

At their May meeting the trustees adopted a $17.2 million operating budget for 1981-82, approved plans for a $2.3 million arts center, and acted on major housing policy stemming from the College's year-long review of student life.

The operating budget represents a 19 percent increase over the current year's $14.5 million budget. A major portion of the increase more than doubles the College's contribution to student financial programs. "We have added $750,000 to student assistance because of uncertainty surrounding federal allocations for financial aid," Sam A. Banks, president, said. "It is imperative that we guarantee that Dickinson and its liberal arts programs will be available to qualified students."

Trustees also approved a $2.3 million renovation plan which in less than two years will turn 52-year-old Alumni Gymnasium into a center for fine arts and music. Drawings show art and music facilities located side-by-side on all floors of the limestone building. Plans from Spillman Farmer, the architect, call for the addition of a third floor over the present old gym area.

Renovation of the building began in June and completion is planned for September, 1982.

Trustees reaffirmed the College's policy of providing housing which encourages student interaction in support of educational objectives. The board also adopted a two-year, rolling system for allocating housing to fraternities and other special or academic interest groups.

Under the new plan, each organization seeking group housing would sign an agreement covering two years. At the end of the first year, the group would be reviewed to ensure that standards of conduct and maintenance are being met. While not automatic, renewal for another two years could come at the end of the second year if the conduct, maintenance, size, and desire of the group so justifies.

Six members of the board of trustees were elected to life trustee status this spring. They are: John M. Davidson, Wayne, a trustee since 1959; William S. Jenkins, Cumberland Md., a trustee since 1958; Alexander Rush, Philadelphia, a trustee since 1971; Boyd Lee

Largest Class Graduates

At commencement in May 472 seniors received bachelor degrees, the largest class in the College's history.

John Kemeny, president of Dartmouth College, in his commencement address, "Change: The Only Constant," told graduating seniors, "There are many who long to go back to the good old days . . . but we must ask just how good were the good old days."

"Change is an essential part of life. There are those who resist all change, and there are those who welcome it. I urge you to be in the latter group," he challenged graduates.

Honorary degrees were presented to Dr. Kemeny, Dr. Mary S. Calderone, and Prof. Lawrence Klein.

Dr. Kemeny received the honorary Doctor of Science degree for his "rare ability to render complex intellectual, technological, educational, and social ideas and issues comprehensible" which "renews our faith in human potentialities in an often frightening technological age."

Dr. Kemeny was the chairman of President Carter's commission which investigated the accident at TMI. He is also a mathematician and computer scientist.

Co-founder and president of the Sex Information and Education Council of the United States, Dr. Calderone received the Doctor of Humane Letters degree for her work fighting "the tragic consequences of sexual ignorance being perpetuated by silence, evasiveness, and fear."

Dr. Calderone helped found the council to "affirm that human sexuality should be regarded through open and frank discussion as a normal part of human life and health."

Professor Klein, the recipient of the 1980 Nobel prize in economics, received the honorary Doctor of Laws degree from Dickinson for developing new ways of understanding the economy of the country.

"He sought to give empirical content to the fundamental aspects of human behavior, capturing our several propensities in a set of equations and weaving these colorful threads into an ordered matrix of intelligible design."

A special citation was presented to Dr. Edmund Pellegrino, president of The Catholic University of America, member of Dickinson's Board of Trustees, and speaker at Sunday morning's baccalaureate service.

Dr. Pellegrino "believes that colleges and universities must reaffirm their dedication to their primary and ancient function of civilizing people," said Sam A. Banks, president of Dickinson College. "Dr. Pellegrino asserts the vital necessity of drawing moral conclusions from the liberal education."

Dr. Pellegrino stressed the absolute obligation of graduates "to examine all decisions from the point of moral consequences" in his baccalaureate sermon to the senior class.

For inspirational teaching during the 1980-81 academic year, graduating seniors voted Philip N. Lockhart the Gano Award. The award, decided by secret ballot of the graduating class, provides the recipient with $1000 and funds for special projects.

Lockhart is professor of classical languages at Dickinson. He was the recipient of the first Gano Award, presented in 1969, and was voted the award again in 1973.

The Hufstader Senior prizes, awarded to the senior man and woman who, in the judgment of the president, have contributed most to the good of the College, went to Edward Geiger of Pottstown and Mary Beth Monahan of Carbondale.

Earlier in the week Arturo A. Fox, professor of Spanish, received the Lindback Foundation Award for Distinguished Teaching.

Professor Fox has been a "quiet force" in the development of Dickinson's program of Latin American Studies and the College's semester-long program in Medellín, Colombia. His work is one of the reasons "why international education is so distinctively a presence within the College curriculum," said George Allan, dean of the College. ■

New Trustee

John V. Thornton, senior executive vice president for financial and legal operations of Consolidated Edison, has been elected to a four-year term to the board of trustees.

"Neither an alumnus of the College nor a parent of a Dickinson student, Mr. Thornton's wisdom and guidance have been extremely helpful to the College during his four years of service on the College's board of advisors," said Dr. Sam A. Banks.

Mr. Thornton was a pioneer member of Dickinson's board of advisors which was established in 1977 to provide special consultation to the College's president and governing board of trustees. From 1979 through 1981, Mr. Thornton served as chairman of that 25-member body.

At various times in his career Mr. Thornton has been a member of the economics faculty at Yale and of the law faculty at Columbia, a professor of public utility law at New York University, and associate dean of New York Law School.

Mr. Thornton served as a member and president of the school board of the Village of Bronxville in Westchester County, N.Y. He is a trustee of Empire Savings Bank, chairman of the board of trustees of New York Law School, a trustee of Pace University, and a trustee of the Citizens Budget Commission of New York City.

Logan Honored

The board of trustees adopted a resolution in May honoring the late Henry Logan '10, Ormond Beach, Fl. and Dillsburg, Pa., for his "deep respect for the law of the land, abiding faith in the church of his fathers, and the devotion to the essential values of education."

The resolution marked Mr. Logan's death on March 6, 1981. He had graduated from Dickinson 71 years earlier.

In addition to a distinguished career as a lawyer, he "labored unstintingly for his beloved church, giving with characteristic generosity of his time, his energies, and his resources," said Samuel

Six Retire From Faculty

Six members of the faculty retired this spring: Paul F. M. Angiolillo, Charles A. Dana Professor of Romance Languages and Literatures; John E. Benson, Charles A. Dana Professor of Chemistry; Marianna Bogojavlensky, professor of German and Russian language and literature; Marcia B. Conner, associate professor of English; Howard C. Long, professor of physics, Joseph Priestley Chair of Natural Philosophy; Richard H. Wanner, professor of psychology.

At the annual dinner for faculty, administrators, and trustees before commencement, Professors Angiolillo and Conner were the speakers.

Professor Angiolillo talked about change at Dickinson. "The fact remains," he said, "that educational philosophy and policies have been refined or redefined; goals have been reexamined and revised; new programs have been developed and older ones expanded; departments have been enlarged and their course offerings greatly increased; services available to students, faculty, staff, parents, alumni, and friends have been improved and some new ones invented and implemented. And with all these changes, I feel keenly that there remain in the College some constants, some invariable qualities, that together form a kind of coherent, holistic personality or spirit that, thank God, persists and still manages to captivate to a greater or lesser degree those who enter the Dickinson community for the first time. The proper mix of the timely and the timeless is still the hallmark of a Dickinson experience. . . ."

The professor said that in talking about innovation he referred to "new forms of correlative and integrative studies that have attempted to refashion or reenforce the subject matter of conventional courses, and at the same time have sought ways of supplementing classroom and library study by new meaningful activities and experiences on and off the campus."

Marcia Conner talked of her switch from reading The Joys of Jello to rediscovering Faulkner and Fitzgerald and Homer and Shakespeare when she joined the faculty in 1964. She said there were not many women around then, either students or faculty.

And Professor Conner had some humorous reminiscences: of arriving early for her first department meeting to be asked by another early arrival, "What century are you?"; or the composition assignment which elicited this remark, "Kennedy's appearance, his family life,

W. Witwer, president emeritus of Dickinson College's board of trustees.

"Mr. Logan recognized that, of all the gifts one can give, the gift of knowledge is one of the most valuable. He endowed a professorship in the department of economics at Dickinson so that instruction might be strengthened in this vital field," Mr. Witwer said.

He created numerous scholarships at Dickinson and his personal association with the students who became the beneficiaries of his scholarships was an experience which he and the scholarship recipients treasured highly.

"A church, a college, a profession, a nation may count themselves privileged indeed to have included among their numbers for a goodly span of years such a man as Henry Logan," said Mr. Witwer.

Alumni Elect

James Gerlach '77, an attorney, has been reelected president of the Alumni Association.

This is his second term as president. He will be joined by: James G. Bowers '51 of Carlisle, vice president; Barbara R. Strite '61 of Gettysburg, secretary; and George Shuman, Jr. '37 of Carlisle, treasurer.

Ruth Spangler '35 of Harrisburg was elected to a four-year term as alumna trustee. She replaces Mary Stuart Specht '57 of Carlisle, who completed a four-year term of office in May.

Elected to three-year terms on the Alumni Council of the College are: Frederick S. Wilson '48, Abington, Pa.; Paul W. Houck '50, Lock Haven; Sally Spangenburg Small '51, West Lawn; Louise Hauer Greenberg '54, Radnor; Margaret Brenner Bushey '69, Carlisle; David R. Witwer '72, Chicago, Ill.; and Richard A. Burnett '78, New Haven, Ct.

Fulbright Award

Dr. Joseph H. Schiffman, James Hope Caldwell Professor Emeritus of American Studies and professor emeritus of English, has received a Fulbright award to teach American literature and civilization this school year in Indonesia.

Dr. Schiffman and his wife are leaving Carlisle the middle of this month and he will begin teaching in September. The academic year at the University of Indonesia at Djakarta runs from September to June 30.

his background, his public relations advisers, and his death will help make him a great hero;" or the course evaluation from a student, "I think I learned quite a bit more than I think."

Beyond the humor, however, Professor Conner had some serious thoughts. She said that, "each generation has its special characteristics. I think young people today are essentially conservative—it's almost as if they are looking for boundaries. There is a very real sense of a world gone awry, or if not awry, then a world that has somehow become unmanageable, and it's all just too much. So students tend to retreat into a private world, or at least a smaller world, determining to take care of themselves. These students really need leadership from faculty and administrators, and they need inspiration as well."

The professor expects to be helping Indonesian professors with Ph.D. programs in American studies. He understands that his students will be teachers of English with ages ranging from 37-55. Dr. Schiffman also expects to work with some master's candidates and some undergraduates.

Djakarta, the American studies professor says, is 12,000 miles from Carlisle and is on the equator. He hopes to travel and lecture in the Far East, perhaps in Burma, India, and Hong Kong. Two slide shows which he developed at Dickinson will be used.

Mrs. Schiffman expects to do volunteer work in the university library. She plans to help with the establishment of an American studies library.

This is Dr. Schiffman's third Fulbright. He was in India in 1964 and France in 1965. He feels that the experience is refreshing intellectually; it is a chance to pick up new ideas. He adds that his former travels also brought a greater appreciation of Dickinson and Carlisle.

Represents Government

Daniel J. Terra, trustee, is representing the federal government on a task force looking into the futures of the national endowment for the arts and humanities. Mr. Terra, a Chicago attorney, is the Reagan administration's designee as an ambassador-at-large for cultural affairs.

What Dickinson can do, she went on to tell the group, "is to provide a model community of spirit where the individual can mature gracefully, developing a personal integrity and a kind of inner toughness that no one can take away. Such a student can dare to be an individual because he or she is one. And such a student may be able to cope even with an unmanageable world."

Prizes honoring three of the retirees have been established: a graduate in the field of Italian or French will receive an award for academic excellence in honor of Professor Angiolillo; an upper-class student of a language and its culture will receive an award for academic excellence honoring Professor Bogojavlensky; a junior who has made a significant contribution to the department of psychology and education will receive an award honoring Professor Wanner.

New League Forms

Eight colleges and universities in the Eastern Pennsylvania-Maryland region are entering into a new football league arrangement beginning with the season of 1983.

The announcement was made simultaneously in June by the presidents and athletic directors of the eight institutions — Dickinson College, Franklin and Marshall College, Gettysburg College, The Johns Hopkins University Muhlenberg College, Swarthmore College, Ursinus College, and Western Maryland College.

The colleges and universities, all of the Division III level of football competition, said that they had found it "timely and appropriate" to form a round-robin schedule among institutions with similar attitudes and practices in intercollegiate football competition and some not within the new league.

Each of the eight institutions, in preparation for the new arrangement, has notified the Middle Atlantic Conference that it will not participate in MAC's football scheduling effective 1983. In the meantime, the established MAC football schedule commitments for the seasons of 1981 and 1982 will be met.

Officials of the eight institutions emphasized that the new league arrangement affects only their football participation and that they have no wish or intent to withdraw from the scheduling arrangements in MAC for other men's and women's sports.

The Middle Atlantic Conference is large and diverse, they noted, and while other sports can be accommodated appropriately within MAC, irreconcilable scheduling choices have developed with respect to football. Over a period of years, MAC colleges have attempted to resolve those problems, but without success. The new arrangement took form readily, with common assent that it had become the only reasonable solution for the participating institutions.

EDITH BLACKBURN HAZLEHURST, Waikiki, HI, had the following poem chosen for publication in the 1981 anthology The World's Great Contemporary Poems:

The Twilight Hours

The hours I wish I could always keep
Are the hours when night lulls the day to sleep.

The bustle of day should come to an end;

It's time to enjoy a book, or a friend.
It's time to calm the troubled breast
When nighttime lulls the day to rest.
Soft colors seem to rest the eye
When nighttime paints the evening sky.

It rests the soul and warms the heart
With a magnificent display of art.
So, it's time to stop but I wish I could keep

Those hours when night lulls the day to sleep.
