BUILDING A STRONG PORTFOLIO

(Provided by Prudential Securities)

Are you the kind of investor who has assembled a portfolio randomly over the years, without a serious regard for how its contents fit and work together? Do you impulsively buy exciting, new financial products or services when they are introduced, ending up with accounts here, there, and everywhere? With a little prodding, many investors would admit they need to build, monitor, and organize their finances better.

Financial experts agree that a strong and successful investment program usually is founded on sound investment principles and reflects your personal needs and objectives. One sound strategic approach to structuring a successful portfolio is called asset allocation. Simply stated, this strategy focuses on establishing diversification among different asset classes as well as among different industries consistent with your personal investment needs and risk tolerance.

Risk tolerance is perhaps the most important factor. If your tolerance is relatively low, you may appreciate larger allocations of cash equivalents (such as money market shares) and good quality fixed income securities. Conversely, a greater risk tolerance may mean that you'll favor more equity orientation in the portfolio, along with a willingness to accept more volatility in return for potentially higher returns.

In addition to your risk tolerance and investment objectives, other personal factors that should be closely examined when building your portfolio include your age and changing time frames, cash flow, portfolio income needs and your tax bracket. In terms of the asset allocation process, age and time frames are significant because they impact the type of investment strategies appropriate for your consideration.

Naturally, capital and income needs, along with current cash flow, must be considered in order to help you build a portfolio with enough liquidity and income to make necessary expenditures without disrupting your investment plans.

Once you've decided on an investment strategy and created a viable portfolio, you should be sure they continue to reflect your investment goals and keep working hard for you. You can do this by monitoring the progress of your investments.

This means more than simply checking the closing prices of stocks or mutual funds when the mood strikes you. On a regular basis—monthly or quarterly—you should check what's been happening to your stocks and mutual funds. At the conclusion of each year, compute the total return for each of your stocks, bonds, and mutual funds. Also annually, you should compare your securities with other comparable measures of market activity, such as the S&P 500 and the Russell 2000. These periodic reviews may prompt you to make some changes in your portfolio. As companies' fortunes ebb and flow with new management, products, and services, so, too, do the returns on investments in their stocks. In addition, other factors may encourage you to make changes in your portfolio, including your age, the economy, and tax reforms.

There's little doubt that a well planned personal portfolio that is reviewed and "fine tuned" on a periodic basis is a key to meeting your financial objectives and remaining in a healthy "fiscal" condition. Working closely with a financial advisor to assist with all these comparisons and working towards achieving these results can be another.
